

BV4811 .W542

Wilberforce, William, 1759-1833.

Practical view of the prevailing religious of professed Christians, in the higher and

A PRACTICAL VIEW OF THE PREVAILING RELIGIOUS SYSTEM OF PROFESSED CHRISTIANS IN THE HIGHER AND MIDDLE CLASSES IN THIS COUNTRY
CONTRASTED WITH REAL CHRISTIANITY.

BY W. WILBERFORCE, Esq.

WITH AN INTRODUCTORY ESSAY, BY DANIEL WILSON, D.D., LORD BISHOP OF CALCUTTA.

SIXTH EDITION.

GLASGOW:

WILLIAM COLLINS, 155, INGRAM STREET;
OLIVER & BOYD, WM. WHYTE & CO., AND WM. OLIPHANT & SON, EDINBURGH; W. F. WAKEMAN, AND WM. CURRY, JUN., & CO., DUBLIN; WHITTAKER & CO., HAMILTON, ADAMS, & CO., AND SIMPKIN & MARSHALL, LONDON.

1837.

INTRODUCTORY ESSAY.

FEW undertakings can be much more difficult than to write any thing in the way of introduction to the following work. It requires no introduction. It is a matter of history. It has been read and admired by one generation, is already in the hands of a second, and will soon pass down to a third. It is this last circumstance indeed which may perhaps apologize for an attempt which must otherwise be exposed to the charge of rashness. The young have a right to ask what were the circumstances of the first publication of such an important volume—what the impression which it left on the minds of men—what its connection with the general interests of religion—what its place in the moral history of our time. To such inquiries we shall endeavour, in the present Essay, to furnish a reply. We presume not to do more than to assist the reader, who shall for the first time take up the work, in forming some judgment upon its merits. Our main object will be to illustrate that great revival of the influence of real Christianity amongst us, which it was the Author's design to promote, and which his work was, in fact, one very considerable mean of deepening and extending. That eminent and revered person, now retired from public life, will, we trust, forgive us, if, in the discharge of a duty to the paramount interests of religion generally, we are led to speak with entire freedom of his book, and in a way which, however we may be upon our guard, will of necessity betray us into details which our respect for his delicacy of feeling would otherwise compel us to restrain. A retired statesman, after a long life spent in the eye of his country—his name connected with almost every great question which has agitated the church or state—can scarcely be permitted to claim the privileges of private writers: his work belongs, with his other labours, to the nation to which he has dedicated it, and becomes a portion of the annals of the times.

We shall, first, make such remarks as may give the reader what we consider a just conception of the merits of the work itself. This will lead us to describe the reception which it met with on its first publication. Its connection with the revival of pure Christianity in our country will follow. We shall then offer a few observations on the subsequent progress of that revival. And, in the last place, suggest some thoughts on the manner in which it may be still further promoted.

I. We shall give the reader a just conception of the merits of the work itself.

‘The Practical View of the prevailing religious system of professed Christians, in the higher and middle classes in this country, contrasted with real Christianity,’ was first published in the spring of the year 1797. The design of the Author was to rouse the nation, and especially the higher orders, to a just view of the subject of real Christianity. It is a manly, and yet conciliatory exposure of the false principles and defective practice of professed Christians, accompanied by a powerful exhibition of what true religion is, as it is delineated in the Bible, and displayed in the spirit and temper of sincere Christians. It is a contrast between Christianity lowered, misapprehended, obscured, falsified, by the prevailing doctrine and morals of the day, and Christianity as it came from Heaven, as it remains in all its freshness in the Sacred Records, as it is loved and obeyed by those in every age who, like the primitive Christians or our Reformers of the sixteenth century, come out from the world and live unto God by the faith of a crucified Saviour. It is a book of first principles, displaying the Christian religion as it ought to exist in the case of every Christian, and then contrasting this with the low and defective standard of the religion prevailing around us.

Few subjects could be more happily chosen; because, without entering into controversy or awakening the hostility of any class of readers, it argues on the admitted principles common to Christians generally, and especially to members of our national Church, and shows, beyond all reasonable doubt, the wide interval which had been interposed between our principles and our practice—our doctrine and our belief—our Bibles and ourselves.

The plan was in a great measure new. By the writings indeed of Jones of Nayland, and Horsley, a formidable inroad had been made on various prevailing heresies and errors. Lyttelton, West, and Paley, had admirably illustrated the Evidences of Christianity. Watson, by his able Apologies, had followed in the same course. The more practical writings of Law, Doddridge, Porteous, and Home, had made a considerable impression. Something still more pointed and powerful had been effected by the vivid expostulations of the poetry of Cowper. But no writer had appeared, especially amongst laymen, to address the nation generally on the plain fundamental and vital truths of our religion, and to confront these truths boldly, and yet affectionately, with the fashionable notions which passed for Christianity. No writer had appeared with mildness and authority, with a ripe understanding of his subject, and a faculty of touching the tenderest springs of the heart, to recall men to the real nature of Christianity itself.

The style and spirit in which the work was executed were almost as new as the subject. Nothing can easily surpass the winning, affectionate, skilful manner of the address. Too many religious works have to overcome obstacles on the score of obscure, technical language, a style inelegant and heavy, a phraseology uncouth in the ears of the educated and refined. Others are open to the charge of an excessive use of certain religious terms, rendered trivial and even repulsive by repetition. Such theological treatises, of whatever merit in other respects, have to work their way up to the notice of the well educated and fastidious, through the mists of prejudice. Half a century may pass before they are known. But the volume before us, with a large measure of all the purity of style of which our language is susceptible, unites a force of argument, and a dignity derived from truth, which few treatises have equalled. The book opens its own way, as an effort of pure composition, as well as an effusion of natural eloquence. It demands and obtains, because it deserves, an instant hearing.

The attractive character of the work is universally allowed. Love is stamped on every page. It is not a dry disputation, a systematic treatise, a polemical discussion. It is a masterly, benevolent, tender appeal to the heart and conscience, on the most important of all subjects. It has the charm of a free, unwritten address—the same richness and ease and flow and delicacy towards the feelings of others which mark such addresses, and yet all the solidity and clearness peculiar to a well studied, elaborate dissertation. It seems to be the spontaneous produce of a mind thoroughly stored with its materials, accustomed to speak before a refined and yet popular audience, and capable, from long experience, of expressing with ease and propriety what it has previously meditated. In short, the book must have been dictated, not written. It is nothing more nor less than a series of speeches in parliament, in which, from brief annotations and hints of topics, the statesman urges upon the legislature his well weighed and important cause.*

Accordingly there is nothing more remarkable in the style and manner of the work than the skill in debate, the parliamentary tact, if we may so speak, which is apparent throughout. You discern in it everywhere the marked effects of the Author's public life. You cannot read three pages without feeling that the writer is in the midst of your very thoughts and feelings: all is business,—all is a vivid delineation

* It was in this way, in fact, that the book was chiefly composed.

tion of actual life,—all is directly aimed at the heart. It is a persuasive address to his fellow-statesmen and countrymen, in which he kindles with his great topics, gains upon your judgment and heart as he proceeds, and leaves you at last under the impressions produced by a sincere and affecting orator rather than of a writer or a controversialist. You see in it the hand of a master, used to state the objections of an opponent, not only fairly, but in the very words that such an opponent would employ; you see the skill of a legislator, compelled to be on the watch, aware that any the least slip would be exposed, and trained to a popular, commanding, and yet measured way of stating things. No adversary is outraged; no personal feelings are wounded; no real difficulties extenuated or denied; but all is open and manly and conciliatory. Almost every imaginable concession is made on each topic. The objections are stated at such length and with so much justice that you tremble as you are reading them, lest a satisfactory answer should not be given; and yet, after repeated admissions, limitations, cautions, apologies, every one of them most apparently kind and sincere, the blow is at last struck so hard and with so much truth of aim as to fall with irresistible force. We are not aware that we ever read any book in which every thing was so fairly and, at the same time, so fully stated. No reader has to complain of any material misrepresentation. The whole habit of the Author's public life seems to have been brought to bear in this benevolent and faithful appeal to his country. Seldom indeed has such a talent for debate, and such an accurate knowledge of the human heart, been united with such a delicate and friendly attention to the feelings of others, and such a force of persuasion and authority of truth.

There is, further, a warmth in the style of the work which adds to its attractions. It bears all the marks of having been composed after years of deliberate preparation, indeed, as to the main topics, and a thorough faculty of discussion, acquired in the best school of eloquence, in just that sort of pressure and hurry from the demands of public duties which lend it a naturalness and warmth and generous urgency which are best adapted to gain its end. It is a book which was poured out, if we may so speak, between two sessions of parliament.* It is the lively and urgent exposé of his views of Christianity, made by a statesman on a sudden impulse, to the vast influential body of legislators and men of the world amongst whom he was acting his part, and whom he had neither the opportunity nor the leisure of acquainting, by any other means, with the true character of those religious principles by which he wished to govern all his own conduct, and to which he would reduce the wandering and unsettled notions of those with whom he habitually conversed.

Accordingly the reasonings of the book are precisely adapted to the persons whom the Author wished to persuade. They are not abstract, scholastic, intricate; but plain, tangible, popular. They are not of that highest class of intellectual discussions, which meet the very first order of minds, but are lost to all others—the world wanted not such arguments,—but they are reasonings of that gentle, intelligible class, which suit the far larger number of persons both in the senate and in the community generally—reasonings which, without disappointing the most exalted intellect, meet and convince the candid, the practical, the thoughtful, the well disposed; in short, the whole mass of considerate and impressible and amiable readers in the higher and middle orders of society.

* Here again we state, as we believe, very nearly the exact matter of fact.

And yet the courage apparent in this work is far from being inconsiderable. The manner is mild indeed, but the undertaking is bold and hazardous. The Author, in attempting it, risked every thing dear to a public man, and a politician as such—consideration, weight, ambition, reputation. He exposed himself to all the misapprehension and hostility which attach to so noble an avowal of the humiliating doctrines of vital Christianity in a corrupt age. But he writes as one who did this deliberately and advisedly. He shrinks not from any consequences which may follow. The unaffected fortitude and courage which real religion inspires, a consideration of its infinite moment to the nation and to each individual, a firm persuasion of the truth of the statements which he made, and an unshaken reliance on the blessing of God to accompany his vindication of it, all manifestly unite to sustain his mind and carry him with calmness and dignity through the effort.

We do not dwell for a moment on the only charge ever alleged against the execution of the work, that the style is sometimes diffuse and languid, and even tedious. Certainly it is not in the highest order of that close, energetic, forcible reasoning which marked the first apologies for Christianity, and the writings of some of the Reformers. No work can embrace, in an equal degree, opposite excellencies. But the deductions on this account are so small, while most of the various beauties compatible with the suavity and benevolence of an affectionate heart are so copiously displayed, that the result may be safely left to every candid reader. The work, after all, was perhaps better adapted, in its present state, to the age in which it was written, than if its faults had leaned on the side of roughness and severity and stricter reasoning. As the writings of Cyprian, Augustine, Wickliffe, Luther, were adapted for the ages for which they laboured, so was this volume well fitted for a reading, educated, polished period—for a free Protestant country—for a people admitting generally all the truths contended for, though they had declined from the right love and practice of them—for a nation where equal laws and the spirit of toleration admitted all the full effects of persuasion to be produced on public opinion.

But to pass from the style of the work to the subject matter of it, it is of more importance, in estimating its merits, to observe that it is A WHOLE—a complete and adequate exposition of Christianity. Not that it is a body of divinity, or a digest of controversies; but it fairly represents the entire scheme of Christianity, in its main doctrines, precepts, spirit, tendency, and character. The Author has a fine conception of the real scope of the Christian religion, and he gives a full and accurate delineation of it. He stands upon the plain old scriptural basis of broad and acknowledged truth. There are no niceties, no novel or doubtful tenets, no deductions to be made from its general excellence, on account of the omission of material truths or the vindication of subordinate errors. Many books on the subject of religion are good on a few points, but confessedly defective or erroneous on others. But this is not the case here. The Author goes through the whole compass of his extensive theme. He assigns to every thing its place. There is no excess, no overstatements, no enthusiasm, on the one hand; no concealment, no compromise of truth, on the other. The main scope of the book is kept steadily in view. The evangelical and practical topics are closely interwoven. The strong foundations of the Gospel are laid in the person, deity, and sacrifice of the Son of God, and the powerful agency of his Spirit; and the fair and ample superstructure is reared in the holy tempers, and active, useful lives, which Christians are encouraged and exhorted and commanded to lead.

Then every part of the work is carefully and, as the old writers express it, painfully wrought out. The ease and grace of the style are not assumed as a cloak for inconsideration. All is the result of evident reflection. Even topics occasionally touched on are abridgments of whatever can be best said on the several questions. The allusion to the origin of evil, for example, and the hints of self-examination, are as complete in their way as the discussion on the use of the passions in religion, and the exercise of love towards an unseen object; which last stands, as we think, almost unrivaled in English theology, and would alone entitle our senator to no mean place amongst the writers of his country. The excellence of the incidental matter may be also seen in the Author's brief but pointed addresses to various classes of readers—the scholar, the historian, the statesman, the philosopher, the moralist, the writer on evidences, the metaphysician, is severally considered, and the topics suitable to each are touched in an appropriate manner. Even the critical observations on authors, though evidently made in passing, are often just and striking.

The originality of the work is another of its commendations. It is, like Lord Bacon's writings, "full of the seeds of things." The author does not follow but lead his age. All teems with life. You see an independent, unfettered mind is at work—a mind richly stored with knowledge, taking its own view of every subject, and illustrating it with new and valuable and sometimes unlooked for matter. The Author is one who thinks for himself. He stamps his own features on his great subject.

Lastly, the sincerity and devotional spirit which pervade the volume encrease its general effect. Every concession, every appeal to the heart, every remonstrance, bespeaks the Author sincere. Whilst the devotional spirit which breaks through perpetually, leads the reader to estimate the true end of religion, as he listens to its precepts, and to imbibe, not the temper of a partisan, but that genuine unaffected piety of heart before God which becomes an accountable and sinful creature. Indeed nothing but this sincerity of devotion could apparently have roused a man of such evident susceptibility and tenderness of natural character to write with the firmness, the force of remonstrance, the fidelity to truth, which glow in his book.* The Author has most manifestly possessed himself of his subject, and his subject has possessed itself of him; and the result is, that one of the most benevolent and affectionate of human beings is intrepid and irresistible, as he ought to be, on so inspiring a theme. This is, after all, the last finish to this remarkable volume. We may have been mistaken in our estimate of its literary merit. We may have been biassed by long habits of admiration, in judging of many of the various excellencies which we ascribe to it. But no one can for a moment doubt the honesty and integrity of the Author. It is the production of a most sincere as well as enlightened Christian. You have his whole heart without disguise. He impresses on you only what he is most intimately persuaded of himself. This carries you away, where nothing else would do it. You might yield a momentary applause to his talents; you might admit the extent of his knowledge; you might be silenced by his arguments; you might admire his eloquence; you might love his amiableness and benevolence; but, at last, it is his SINCERITY, backed by all these other qualities, which gains your entire confidence, and ensures your permanent and fixed attention and regard.

* It is to our mind a striking proof of sincerity, that the two failings to which, from his station and natural cast of character,

II. We now proceed to describe the reception which the work met with on its first publication.

The success which it obtained might indeed be supposed to be too well known to require much observation. But, after a lapse of thirty years, some details may not be superfluous. Never perhaps did any volume by a layman, on a religious subject, produce such a writer might have been expected to be most indulgent. he treats, in fact, with the most unsparing severity—the love of applause, and a reliance on amiable tempers, as a substitute for religion.

duce a deeper or more sudden effect. It came upon the whole world of statesmen and literati and divines quite by surprise. The Author had been long known as a public man. His benevolent character had endeared him to the country. His perpetual activity in parliament, and the just weight attached to his character and talents, had placed him full in the view of the nation. He had been long known to be devout and conscientious in private life; but to what extent his religious principles went, few amongst the public men with whom he daily acted cared to inform themselves. It was a thing quite unprecedented for a leading parliamentary speaker to publish any considerable work—much less a work on religion. The moment it appeared therefore every one stood astonished. The rank in life and generosity of the Author naturally led him to place an early copy in the hands of his very extensive circle of acquaintance and friends. It was thus, at the same moment, read by all the leading persons of the nation. An electric shock could not be felt more vividly and instantaneously. Every one talked of it, every one was attracted by its eloquence, every one admitted the benevolence and talents and sincerity of the writer. It was acknowledged that, whether good or bad on a few peculiar topics, such an important work had not appeared for a century. The great elevation of its views and principles stamped upon it a noble singularity, which did not fail to strike the experienced observer. It was the Author's first publication. It derived therefore an additional charm from the curiosity of his countrymen, as well as from its own intrinsic excellencies.

Opposition indeed arose against it as the first admiration a little subsided. This was to be expected. No valuable end could have been accomplished in a great and free country like this, if opposition had not called the work into further notice and interested men most deeply in the subjects discussed in it. If it had been an unresisted remonstrance, it would soon have been a forgotten one. An edition or two would have hurried it down to the gulph of oblivion. But opposition put it precisely in the position most of all to be desired for such a work. It made it more and more the subject of conversation, of argument, of direct and lively interest. It gave it additional circulation and currency. Men were surprised at what Christianity was described to be; they were offended at the picture given of spiritual religion; they were dismayed at the representation of the distance to which modern Christianity had receded from its ancient limits; they knew not what to say of such an open and bold confession of those peculiarities of the Christian faith, which they had been accustomed to hear classed with sectarianism and folly. Nothing could be alleged against the writer. He was not an ecclesiastic. He was not a weak or harsh dogmatist. He was not ignorant. He could not be charged with want of benevolence and talent. He was confessedly one of the most able legislators of the day. He had not only been long in parliament, but had been mixed up with every great public question. He was the private friend of one of the greatest and most skilful prime ministers, according to general opinion—certainly one of the most popular—which this country ever saw, and had long been a leading supporter of his measures in parliament.* He represented the most important county of England. He was not only not in office, but known to be independent and above suspicion in his political conduct. He had also been actively engaged as the distinguished leader in the great question of the abolition of the Slave Trade. His private morals, his liberality, his benevolence of character, his social talents, the combination of attractive qualities which added a charm to his conversation and gained almost every one whom he approached—all conspired to give the work a reception the most intensely eager and interesting, and all conspired to stimulate the opposition which was made to many of his statements. The book was too true, too carefully guarded in all its parts, too mild and affectionate, too scriptural, too forcible and alarming, to be overlooked or despised. Every one allowed that the Author had much to say—that he deserved a hearing—that he was sincere—that in many things he was right—that he ought, in short, to be read, and would and must be attended to.

* Mr. Pitt.

The consequence was, that few volumes on such a subject, perhaps not one, ever had a more wide and rapid circulation. Three or four large editions were exhausted in the first few months. Edition upon edition followed during the succeeding years. And so permanent has been the demand, that it has now arrived at the fifteenth impression. Translations have further been made into most of the European languages;* and the reprints in America have amounted, as we are informed, to twentyfive editions.

The curiosity of the public, particularly of statesmen, and the higher orders of the clergy, was quickened by the attacks of those who were known to favour Socinian and Jacobin principles. The loyalty of the writer, and the station which he filled in parliament, pointed him out as an object of animadversion and satire. In the House of Commons, sarcastic remarks were made by one or two of the more violent partisans of opposition; and various pamphlets were published, in which his principles of obedience to authority, and his orthodox tenets as a churchman, were equally condemned. In some cases, the daring language of Socinian writers bordered on open blasphemy. To not one of these did he vouchsafe to reply. Such attacks led considerate men to read the work with greater avidity, and disposed them to the belief, that he who was so clearly right in his parliamentary conduct and his political principles might not be very wrong in his estimate of the religion which he had so deeply studied and so ably defended.

* French, German, &c. Into the Spanish, a translation is now in hand.

An insidious and laboured article also, of a dangerous character, in one of the periodical reviews,* tended to encrease the eagerness with which the orthodox and candid among the higher orders received the work. They discerned that the common cause of Christianity was in some measure involved in it. They read, with softened feelings, our senator's warm appeals on spiritual religion when they saw them united with so distinguished a regard to the religion of their country.

* The Monthly Review, which, for a long series of years, corrupted our religion and literature by the diligent admixture of Socinian principles; but which has lately, as we hear, fallen into far better hands.

It belongs to the history of the reception of this volume to detail two notices of it, which contributed to its being favourably received by the churchmen and politicians of the time.

In the British Critic,* a review then widely circulated among the clergy, and which continued to lead in the first rank of periodical publications of that class, till a change in its general tone, and what, in fact, amounted to a departure from its own spirit and principles, alienated the confidence of the public, an article appeared which warmly defended the general tendency and scope of the work. We give some extracts:—

“In recommending to the public one of the most impressive books on the subject of religion which has appeared within our memory, we entirely agree with the Author on the necessity which exists for awakening many nominal believers to a recollection of the most important doctrines of Christianity, and an active and heartfelt sense of religion.”

“We feel very strongly that an extra-official exhortation, assisted by the credit of his station, the just and general confidence in the worth and sincerity of his character, the clearness of his intellect, and the force of his eloquence, will produce a more extensive and on many minds a more powerful effect than any instructions from the pulpit or from the pen of a divine.”

“Towards this great work, the present publication is perhaps intended as a providential instrument: and we should be deficient in the truest kind of patriotism if we neglected to afford it all the aid which our recommendation can bestow.”

* Vol. x, for the year 1798.

“ Of his book, the far greater part is sound and genuine Christianity; and would as such be received were not his readers more anxious to invent excuses for their own indifference than to derive the proper advantage from a work of real piety.”

“ Every credit is due to the author for his frank and open confession of his faith in a corrupt age. His language is correct, elevated, and energetic; his motives evidently pure, his sentiments of religion for the most part just, and his knowledge of his subject masterly.”

These, it will be admitted, are high commendations; but they yield in warmth to the expressions which occur in the prefatory pages of the volume, containing a half-yearly summary of literature. Under the head of Theology, it is there stated:—

“ We have no hesitation in giving the first place to Mr. Wilberforce. True it is, that he does, in a few pages, betray an adherence to a sect whose religion is usually over-tinctured by enthusiasm. Yet the tenets of that sect, as distinguished from the true Church of England, are nowhere prominent in the work, while those of genuine Christianity glow in every page. Eloquent, animated, frequently sublime, how can it be read without a glow of piety and delight by any thinking Christian? It is a book to make an era in the history of religion; and we should blush to dwell on petty objections.”

The subject of enthusiasm alluded to in the last extract, and in some other passages of the review not now produced, shall be noticed presently. In the mean time, it is impossible not to feel, that such an eulogium, at its first appearance, from such a quarter, must have powerfully aided its circulation amongst the clergy.

To statesmen and literary men, the volume was not less strongly recommended in the “Pursuits of Literature,” a work whose author was never publicly acknowledged, but which has long been attributed, and it is supposed justly, to the pen of Mr. Matthias. It was a literary and political satire, in English verse, published in parts, from the spring of 1794 to about the middle of 1797. Copious notes were appended; to which additions were made at each republication, till as late as the year 1803, perhaps later. The work is in general distinguished for sound principle, patriotism, talent; and especially for acute and somewhat severe remarks on all sorts of persons and all sorts of writings and almost all sorts of things. The style of the notes is clear, forcible, and eloquent. The learning, thickly sown throughout, is rich and pure. The work had a most rapid circulation. The following is the notice taken of Mr. Wilberforce: *—

“To me, all heedless of proud fashion’s sneer, Maurice is learn’d, and Wilberforcē ^(v) sincere, (Though on his page some pause in sacred doubt,)
As Gisborne serious, and as Pott devout.

“^(v) See ‘A Practical View,’ &c. Some very serious persons have their doubts as to the theological principles of this work in their full extent, and I fear it is far too rigid and exclusive in its doctrines. There is also too much of a sectarian language, which cannot be approved. But of the intention, virtue, learning, and patriotism, of the eloquent and well informed senator, I have the most honourable and decided opinion.

* We quote from the fourteenth edition, 1808, p. 434. It confirms the statement we have made concerning the wide diffusion of Mr. Wilberforce’s book, that the sale of the “Pursuits of Literature”—the most able and popular satirical and literary publication of the day—scarcely surpassed it in rapidity and extent of circulation.

“ His work is vehement, impassioned, urgent, fervid, instant; though sometimes copious to prolixity, and, in a few parts, even to tediousness. Perhaps it is the production of an orator rather than of a writer. I should think it had been dictated. Throughout the whole there is a manly fortitude of thought, firm and unshrinking. But for my own part, for obvious reasons, I dislike the term, ‘Real Christianity,’ as exclusively applied to any set of propositions drawn from the gospel.

“ From external circumstances indeed I would not take theology from Athanasius or Bossuet, morality from Seneca, or politics from Lansdowne or Siéyes. But I will own that, from a scrutiny into the public and private character of Mr. Wilberforce, I am inclined to think that his enemies would be forced into an acknowledgment, (as it is recorded in the words of a prophet,) that they ‘can find no occasion against this man, except they find it against him concerning the law of his God.’ A reader of his work must be good or bad in the extreme, who may not receive some advantage from such a composition. I am unworthy to praise it, and I feel myself so.”

These quotations tend to give a just idea of the reception which this publication met with at the time. The very exceptions which the author of “The Pursuits of Literature” made to it served to quicken curiosity and promote examination into the principles of the writer. Without some such deductions, strange as they seem to us now, the commendations would not then have been in general well received. Unqualified praise would have ensured the sweeping condemnation of the large bodies whom it chiefly addressed. Such censures were the tax paid by so powerful an appeal to the nation, on its first appearance. If such reflections had not been current, the public mind must have been in a state not to have needed the animadversions which occasioned them.

It is indeed a curious circumstance, and deserves notice. The very attempt to restore a decayed national piety, if such an attempt be really needed, implies, in the state of mind and principles of the great mass of influential persons, an ignorance, an indifference, or a hostility to vital religion which will assuredly be roused to resent, in the first instance, the fervid remonstrance; and the resentment will of course show itself, if it be practicable, in misrepresentations of the talents, learning, motives, spirit, sentiments, of the writer. If these are not easily vulnerable, then recourse will be had, as in the case before us, to the loose and more general charge of fanaticism, attachment to a sect, excessive strictness; which all mean nothing more than a petty revenge on a writer by far too benevolent and too able to be rejected or despised.

Let us however, for a moment, pause to weigh the charges preferred against our Author. In the "British Critic," besides the allusion to a sect which we have cited, the following accusations are advanced:—

“ It is usually censured as too severe, and on the few passages which seem to mark a tendency to a particular species of enthusiasm, more stress is placed than the occasion properly demands. Mr. Wilberforce may be connected with a sect—of this we are not anxious to enquire,” &c.

“ He shows, in some parts, a bias towards a sect which, by the fanatical interpretation of the doctrines of grace and divine influence, has thrown the greatest discredit upon the genuine tenets on those subjects.”

The Reviewer further taxes him with “ palliating the vulgarity of uninstructed teachers—with speaking against public schools and universities—with carrying his dislike to the stage to a mistaken degree of strictness.”

Such is the amount of the most plausible allegations of the theological and literary writers of the time; for we do not take into consideration the coarse objections of the Infidel and Socinian school. And of what real weight are they? Omitting the order in which we have cited them, we think they may be reduced to three sources. They either spring from misapprehensions on the great subject of religion itself, or from a begging of the question in hand, or from a fastidiousness altogether unworthy of a thoughtful and sincere inquirer.

To begin with the first: the objection about “ a set of propositions being drawn from the gospel, and named real Christianity,” IS MERE MISAPPREHENSION. The main scope of any practical science must be drawn out into certain axioms or principles or propositions; and if the leading doctrines and precepts of the gospel have been obscured and eluded, what is to be done by a reformer but to appeal to the Divine Records, and to mark the distinction strongly between nominal and vital religion, by such statements of doctrine and practice—call these statements “a set of propositions,” or what you will—as may arouse the conscience, instruct the faith, guide the judgment, animate the devotions, elevate the principles, purify the conduct of his countrymen; and recall them from the form of godliness to the power, from error to truth, from the shadow and image to the substance and reality of Christianity?

The charge of over-strictness is ready to be advanced, as soon as this first objection is silenced. But surely it requires no very large share of candour to allow that this is A BEGGING OF THE QUESTION. In a work which brings forward, against a corrupt age, a bold and well supported accusation of departure from the original purity of the Christian System, it is clearly one of the weakest imaginable replies to say, The statements are too rigid. The question is, What saith the authoritative declaration of Scripture? A book may be far too strict for the habits and fashions of the day and compared with the general doctrine and practice which prevail, and yet not at all too strict when compared with the demands and decisions of the gospel itself. In proportion as men have departed from the true standard of piety, and established a variety of false maxims of conduct, undoubtedly all appeals to primitive Christianity must appear strict. But this is not the fault of the author who detects the real state of things, but of the world which makes the detection necessary. Then let the opponent consider, that Christianity is every where represented in the New Testament as a restraint, an effort, a series of difficulties overcome, a course of self-denial. Let him remember, also, that the abundant reward which awaits the victor, the heavenly rest, the glory above and beyond this lower world which is the prize of the successful combatant, implies the previous course of difficulty on which the whole objection rests.

Nor let it be forgotten that, in human affairs, men constantly act on the principle of denying present pleasure, and undergoing present inconvenience, for future counterbalancing advantages.

And what, after all, is the sacrifice which Christianity demands for which she does not assign the reason and supply the adequate motive? Does not the divine principle of love make every restraint practicable—nay, easy? Does not the influence of grace fit and prepare the heart for its task? Is there not a heavenly bias communicated—a sacred apprehension—a new taste—a birth from above, which renders the path of duty possible, natural, necessary to the sincere Christian? Then, where is this charge of rigid and overstrained injunctions? Where this allegation of impracticable strictness? Does it not clearly proceed on taking for granted a question which must stand or fall by the unerring sentence of the Word of God?

Driven, however, from these flimsy and insecure retreats, our opponent entrenches himself in the strong fastness of general prejudice—in a FASTIDIOUSNESS ALTOGETHER UNWORTHY OF A SINCERE INQUIRER. “The book is of a sectarian cast. The author belongs to a sect. The spirit of the religion is over-tinctured with enthusiasm." Feeble and miserable cavil on a subject of such a momentous character ! And are all the nameless shades of party and prejudice, in a great and free nation, to be congregated, in order to scare away the inquirer from the honest influence of truth ? What ! is there any branch of science or art which is free from this indistinct charge of party spirit ? When was it that politics were purified from this admixture ? What was the period when polemical divinity stood clear of the imputation of creating divisions in the church ? And shall a book like the one in question, the very characteristic of which is benevolence, be condemned for a supposed tincture, slight as it is confessed to be, of a sectarian language or spirit ? The fact is, no impartial reader can harbour the insinuation. The whole style and drift of the work is perhaps as free from any just charge of party feeling as any religious treatise in our language. It is far too noble and generous to belong to a sect. Its leading features are manliness and independence of thought, elegance and naturalness of style, exuberant candour, and charity of spirit ; every thing the farthest removed from the narrow, artificial trammels of the minor subdivisions of the Christian church.

But we are betrayed into too great length. We shall be reminded, that after giving an account of the reception of the work we were to consider,

III. Its connection with the revival of religion in our country.

The peculiar importance of the volume under review cannot be justly estimated, without considering the circumstances of England at the time of its publication, and its wide influence upon the progress of a general restoration of Christianity among us.

No wise man undervalues opportunities. The same treatise, however excellent, may at one period be of very confined service to religion; and at another acquire, from unexpected contingencies, great additional weight. It was the peculiar happiness of our Author, to write at a moment when, in the dispositions of Providence, his appeal to his fellow-countrymen was to be attended with beneficial consequences, which no human foresight could have predicted.

It was one of the principal means of awakening the minds of the leading persons in our country to the truths of spiritual religion, at that critical period of the late war, when infidelity was spreading too widely among all classes, and was threatening the destruction of the altar and the throne.

We need not do more than recall to our reader's mind the state of things just previously to the year 1797, when this book first appeared. The revolutionary principles of France, after desolating that fine country, had infected our own. Europe beheld, with dismay, the Christian faith abjured, the Christian institution of the Sabbath abrogated, Christian morals overthrown; and a flippant, unholy, presumptuous philosophy, pretending to supply the place of Christian motives and Christian practice. The plague was secretly extending itself throughout Europe. The revolutionary governments of France, succeeding rapidly one another, had few points of resemblance except in their opposition to Christianity. England was especially marked out as the object of their hostility. Some of the political parties in our own country appeared too much to adopt the language, and aid, however undesignedly, the projects of infidelity. The ministers of religion were far from supplying in an adequate manner the remedy for the evil. Our national church indeed upheld the majestic front of Christianity, and dispensed the most important benefits among our people; but the spirit and purity of her ministers were far from corresponding in any adequate measure with the evangelical simplicity of her doctrines and the piety of her devotional formularies. The decline from the principles of the Reformation, which had begun under our first Charles, and had been lamentably encreased by the fanaticism of the Commonwealth, and the latitudinarianism and immorality of the times following the restoration of the Royal Family, still chilled the warmth of public devotion, and the efficiency of parochial instructions. The infidel writers fostered by this state of things, had been refuted indeed by argument, but had not been sufficiently repelled by the most powerful of all weapons—the holy doctrines and consistent lives of the ministers of the Christian church.

Among the mass of the people, through God's goodness, a most salutary influence of religion had been revived and propagated, by the honest and persevering labours of different bodies, ranked under the general name of Methodists. But not a few evils had mingled, as might have been expected, with their pious efforts; and their success was connected with an alarming secession from the national church. The controversies also, in which their leaders had been engaged, had not left a favourable impression; and the few clergy who were supposed to listen favourably to their expostulations were involved in the reproach which rested on their name. Thus a general neglect or contempt for spiritual religion was but too prevalent in the influential ranks in our country.

To stem the torrent of infidelity therefore in the higher and middle classes of society—to rouse the national establishment to the holy efforts for which it was so well adapted—to restore the standard of that pure and vital Christianity, on which all subjection to law, and all obedience from motives of conscience, and all real morality and piety, ultimately depend—to sow anew the principles of loyalty, contentment, peace, holiness, deeply and permanently in the minds of men—to rescue, in a word, our country from impending ruin, and render her a blessing to the nations—to these high ends something more was decidedly wanting.

The writings of statesmen did not meet the case. They excited indeed a just horror of atheism and insubordination; they painted the miseries of revolutionary frenzy in its true colours; they vindicated the national creed in general, and the national clergy; they enforced the importance of Christianity in its morals and its influence on the good order of society; but all this was partial and ineffective. There was too much of personality and acrimony in their strictures—too much of worldly policy; they understood not the full extent of the malady which they treated, nor did they rightly conceive of the nature of that heart-felt Christianity which was alone capable of producing a cure.

In this state of things—the storm of the French Revolution still raging—an open renunciation of Christianity just made in a great nation—Europe rent asunder with a war, which, after a duration of four or five years, seemed farther than ever from a close—the church feeble, and full of apprehension—the ministers of state and the legislature overwhelmed with schemes of defence abroad and regulation at home—the minds of thoughtful men portending calamities—untold difficulties thickening around:—in this state of things, who could be found to stand in the gap, who could rise with the necessary talent and reputation to calm the distracted people, who could mildly and yet authoritatively interpose between the clamours of party, who could recall men, with a bold and friendly voice, to the true source of their salvation, and the adequate remedy for their troubles? One man at length appeared. Our Author was the honoured individual. He undertook the task, unconscious to himself of the extent of service he was rendering his country. He possessed all the various natural advantages required for such an emergency; and he was soon acknowledged to be the person who could speak with effect, at such a moment, on the subject of religion—who could best make an open confession of its genuine doctrines before his fellow-statesmen, and appeal effectually to their hearts and consciences as to the necessity of a return to the faith and piety of their fathers.

Two points especially lent weight to his remonstrances.

His loyalty and attachment to his king exempted him from any suspicion of leaning towards revolutionary principles, in the religious feeling which he laboured to extend amongst the leading people of his day. No one could doubt the general soundness of his political principles; no one could call in question his truly English heart; no one could insinuate that democracy or disorder might lurk under the guise of his religious exhortations. The importance of this circumstance will be more clearly seen if we bear in mind, that it was the nobility and gentry of the nation, the bishops and clergy, the leaders in parliament, the great mass of the warm adherents to the Church of England and the political government of the state, that required the remonstrance. Other classes among us were not without their religious writers. But who was capable of fixing the attention of the great, the dignified, the elevated, the powerful? Who could gain admission for his admonitions into those circles where innovation was dreaded as a pestilence, where usage and custom and compliance with established forms bore undivided sway? Who could compel these persons to doubt the sufficiency of their actual views of religion? Who could make an address, upon the most offensive of all themes, interesting to them, the object of curiosity, the topic of conversation, the attractive point of something like discussion and rational inquiry? Who could introduce the greatest of all changes, in an agitated moment, on the most susceptible of points, without awakening fatal suspicions? We do not wait for the answer to all these questions,—through God's goodness, the difficulty was met by the work before us, and, in a great measure, lessened or removed.

Nor was the other point to which we adverted, as giving weight to his remonstrances, of less moment. The benevolence, the unaffected, the deep-seated benevolence which pervaded the treatise, gave it a passport to most candid minds, and united with the various excellencies of the work itself, which we have enumerated in a former section, to make it almost irresistible. Had the discussion been conducted in the spirit of controversy, had personal feelings been roused, had it been written, in short, in any other temper than that of uniform affection and goodwill, it might, and would, we think, have failed of the high purpose which it ultimately attained. An angry or disputatious reformer, however eminently gifted, would have raised his voice in vain, in the midst of the political heats and apprehensions of the times. But the language of love could not be repulsed ; the tender-hearted advocate of the wrongs of Africa, the sympathising, sincere supporter of various public and private charities, was allowed to urge his peaceful suggestions—his well known voice was recognised—his motives confessed to be pure—his claim to attention admitted—his advice weighed—his religious appeal suffered to arouse and stimulate. Even when he spoke out most boldly, and advanced the most novel statements; nay, when he attacked with penetrating force the degenerate sentiments and practice of his countrymen, love opened the way to his arguments, and disposed men to consider, at least, the case which he endeavoured to establish.

The consequence was, the work made considerable way precisely in the quarters where it was most wanted; and contributed, in no small measure, to the progress of that general revival of religion which had already been begun, and which it is our earnest wish by every line in these pages to promote.

The manner in which it may be conceived that it was subservient to this great end it is not difficult to point out.

1. It went to accredit real Christianity to statesmen and legislators. It was an exposition of the unknown subject, by one of their own body. It brought it down, from the regions of conjecture and general prejudice, to the plain tangible question of a matter of fact. It placed it before the wide political circle in which the Author moved, as a point of investigation, to be settled by a reference to the admitted oracles of the Christian faith. Religion thus became the study of those who, by their station and influence, gave laws to the popular sentiments and manners. The peculiar doctrines of the gospel were no longer dismissed summarily, as the tenets of low uninformed sectaries, but weighed and examined as the opinions of an able and well informed public person.

2. It is only extending this observation to say, that the work conveyed important information to the higher classes generally in our country, and soon swayed, in some degree, the prevalent opinions on the subject of religion. The thoughtless indeed, the dissipated, the utterly religious, it could not immediately reach; but with the vast body of thinking persons, of those who had a reverence for Christianity, who adhered to the national church, and were open to a friendly though penetrating remonstrance, it made its way rapidly. In many instances it surprised, it silenced, it informed; in others it aroused, it alarmed, it convinced, it changed. Among the higher ranks of the clergy also, not a few were still more powerfully influenced perhaps, though more slowly, and after a longer process of consideration and reflection.* Universities, chapters, dignitaries, are, from the nature of the case, less open, in the first instance, to appeals on the subject of religion than other bodies; because, from their professional studies and occupations, their minds are pre-occupied, their judgments are already formed, charges of decline in piety assume a personal aspect, new statements of Christian doctrine and practice may be construed as reflections on themselves. But when the first access to the minds of such classes of persons is fairly opened, the influence afterwards gained is proportionably important, and pregnant with widespread consequences.

3. Perhaps there was no order of men on whom the work, as connected with the progress of the revival of religion, had a more important operation than the younger clergy. It bore powerfully on them, opened a new view of Christianity, addressed their consciences, and explained the difficulties in the state of Christianity which they had not been able to discover. It was the book most exactly adapted for the reading, well educated, enquiring minds of the young clergy. It was upon their own topic. It

* In the autumn of 1797, the late venerable Bishop of Durham (Barrington) animadverted on the subject of the decay of spiritual religion, almost in the very words of Mr. Wilberforce's book: a subject which his Lordship resumed at length in his charge in 1801.

In the year 1799, the Bishop of London (Porteus) not only urged the same complaint, but recommended expressly our Author's work.

We say nothing of the celebrated charges of Bishop Horsley, so well known, and so highly esteemed.

addressed them with a talent, an authority, a masterly knowledge of the subject, and yet a modesty and benevolence of style, which could not be mistaken. It took them up precisely where they stood—told them the strongest and most offensive truths, in the most courteous manner—touched their feelings to the very quick—supplied the intermediate ideas between their actual notions and real Christianity—and strove to win them to the earnest pursuit of religion as their happiness and duty. How extensively these effects were produced we cannot venture to say. That a most important impulse was thus communicated and propagated in the class of the young and intelligent and active clergy, who at length give the tone to all others, cannot be doubted.

4. Another order of persons, which we must not omit, was that numerous body whom other treatises on religion had carried on a certain way, but who needed further aid in order to penetrate into the interior of the Christian temple. Those whom Law, or Nelson, or the author of the “Whole Duty of Man,” or Pascal, or Nicole, had trained to piety and seriousness, our Author took by the hand and led on to more evangelical views of religion—quickened, consoled, strengthened, cheered, animated to effort and zeal in their Christian course.

5. Then, the book tended to form a school in Divinity; it raised up a large and important class of writers, who propagated the sentiments which they imbibed from their master, and revived and thus widened the sphere of religious truth and activity. One distinguished female writer indeed had already begun that admirable course of practical treatises which has raised her to so high an elevation among the ornaments of her country. But in how large a measure the early efforts of Mrs. More were strengthened by the manly and powerful pen of our senator, we need hardly mention to those who know the similarity of sentiment and warmth of friendship which have, for so long a period of years, bound these distinguished individuals together.*

6. In short, when these and similar considerations are fairly weighed, it may be doubted whether many single books, in any period of our history, have exceeded it in valuable and durable consequences. Compare it, for instance, with any one of the best pieces of bishop Hall, Baxter, Owen, archbishop Leighton, in the two centuries preceding the last, and we think we shall at once recognise the wide difference between the effects produced by any of them and those of the work before us. Or take some of the most useful writings of his contemporaries, or persons just before his own day—Watts, Doddridge, archbishop Secker, bishop Porteous, R. Hall—and it will be acknowledged, unless we are deceived by love to our Author, that not one of these stood in any thing like the relation to a general revival of religion which our eloquent statesman's

* Mrs. More's "Thoughts on the Manners of the Great," preceded the publication before us; but her greatest work, "The Strictures," and the numerous and valuable practical religious treatises which followed, were many years after it.

We cannot here help adverting to the powerful effects produced by the "Cheap Repository Tracts," of the same eminent lady, in stemming the torrent of revolutionary principles at that critical period, which we have before noticed, and in diffusing among the lower classes those sound political and religious principles which Mr. Wilberforce's work was the means of diffusing among the higher orders.

occupied. It is readily allowed, that many of these pieces surpassed it as devotional, expository, controversial productions. But as a noble appeal to a degenerate age,—as a work which FORMS AN ERA IN THE HISTORY OF THE TIMES, we must go back, in order to find a parallel to it, to the primitive Church—to the days of Augustine, or the glorious period of the Reformation; that is, to times when similar revivals of piety were promoted and extended by somewhat similar means.

7. We do not dwell on the benefit which the work produced on the minds of the faithful ministers and servants of Christ scattered throughout our country, and who were previously labouring in the same field, because this may rather seem to fall under the head of ordinary cases. It may be doubted, however, whether the good it produced in this respect has been sufficiently estimated. To strengthen the hands of the dispersed but faithful few in a declining period, to cheer them under discouraging circumstances, to unite them by a public appeal to the nation, to raise them from unmerited reproach, to open the way for their more public and energetic exertions, is, in a moment of investigation and movement in religion, of the very last importance.* Nor do we dwell on

* As a specimen of the benefits produced on the pious clergy, we give the following extract from a letter of the late Rev. T. Scott:—

“ It (the work before us) is a most noble and manly stand for the gospel; full of good sense and most useful observations on subjects quite out of our line; and in all respects fitted for usefulness; and coming from such a man, it will probably be read by many thousands who can by no means be brought to attend either to our preaching or writings. Taken in all its probable effects, I do sincerely think such a bold stand for vital Christianity the important effects of the work in correcting the crude and inaccurate notions of evangelical religion, which were not uncommon,—notions which went to separate doctrine from practice, and to inculcate high tenets and opinions, without the proportionate admixture of moral exhortation and precept. The subserviency of the work to the extension and purity of the revival of religion, in this view, can scarcely be too highly appreciated.

But to return. On a review of the connection of this publication with the progress of real piety among us, we cannot help observing, further, how admirable are the ways of the Almighty, in revisiting from time to time, his church. Men are qualified and placed in circumstances to effect specific purposes in the order of events, for the extensive benefit of their country and the world.

8. It will, we are sure, be recollected, that in every renewed diffusion of true religion, it has pleased God to raise up certain instruments to procure that protection and aid to the efforts of his servants, which governors and legislators, and persons in authority, has not been made in my memory. He has come out beyond all my expectations. He testifies of the noble and amiable and honourable, that their works are evil; and he proves his testimony beyond all denial. He gives exactly the practical view of the tendency of evangelical principles for which I contend; only he seems afraid of Calvinism, and is not very systematical; perhaps it is so much the better. It seems, likewise, a book suited to reprove and correct some timid friends, who are at least half afraid of the gospel, being far more prudent than the apostles were, or we should never have been able to spell our Christian truths from their writings. But it is especially calculated to show those their mistake who preach evangelical doctrines without a due exhibition of their practical effects. I pray God to do much good by it; and I cannot but hope that I shall get much good from it, both as a preacher and a Christian.—Life, page 347, 4th Edition.

under certain aspects of things, can, humanly speaking, alone bestow. Thus “kings become nursing fathers and queens nursing mothers to the church.” At the Reformation, the influence of truth on the assembled princes and dignitaries, and nobles, at the diet of Worms, and especially on the Elector of Saxony, was amongst the most evident causes of the progress of the evangelical doctrines. In like manner, the broad shield of authority which the Elector last named threw around Luther, preserved that magnanimous reformer from the violence of his adversaries. The powerful influence of Cranmer, and our Sixth Edward, in the early period of the English Reformation, and of Elizabeth and her able ministers of state, in the progress of it, cannot be forgotten. In like manner, in our own day, if spiritual religion is to be guarded in her efforts, to be allowed the free exercise of union and co-operation, to be permitted to write and preach openly to the world—if she is to send forth Bibles and missionaries and travelers and agents, and propagate herself unrestrained through heathen lands, the government of our country must, to a certain degree, concur—the general spirit of persons in authority must be favourably swayed—persecution and prohibitory laws must be silenced—the governors of our distant colonies must aid our labours. Worldly things must subserve and carry on heavenly.

Now, the book before us had the effect, as it appears to us, of opening the way to all this assistance: it broke through the ban and barrier of prejudice in the great—it procured for the followers and disciples of Christ the aid which the mercy of God saw to be necessary to the wider dissemination of the gospel at home and abroad. Religion was defended—shown to be reasonable, pure, holy, consistent, benevolent. Those who would not allow every position, saw enough of the general nature of real Christianity to aid its progress or to be silent about its dissemination. An impulse was given to legislators and dignitaries and sovereigns. The way was prepared for the march of the evangelical doctrines throughout the world. We are far indeed from referring to this volume the general revival of religion in our country. This preceded, as we have stated, our Author's efforts. There were numerous fellow-workmen in this great field. The common people had been already roused. A thousand things afterwards conspired, in the state, in the church, and in the spirit and success of various bodies separated from the national establishment, to that event. But this particular book occupied a post nobly and singularly: it was a mighty instrument in carrying forward the great work, and advancing it in its progress—an opportune and powerful agent, in concurrence indeed with, and in succession to, and in advance of others; but still a powerful agent, through the mercy of God, (to which alone is every blessing to be ascribed,) in aiding and extending the revival of pure Christianity. And the work was this, as it was the medium of communication between the mass of religious persons and the clergy and elevated ranks in society, the accredited and successful apology of evangelical truth before senators and dignitaries and nobles and kings. But this leads us to the consideration of,

IV. The progress of the revival of religion, since the publication of the "Practical View" in 1797.

And here the difficulty of the subject increases. To venture to give any opinion, with whatever diffidence, on a question so vast, fills the mind with apprehension; and we are only induced to proceed, from the conviction, that in a day like the present it is no time to be silent—every one is bound to contribute his aid, small as it may be, towards an object so infinitely momentous, and which can only be accomplished, under the grace of God, by the united advice and efforts of all of every class who can in any measure estimate its importance.

We conceive, then, that the progress of the revival of religion, which had been long going on in England, and which, during the last thirty years, has been so remarkably deepened and extended at home, and been propagated in almost every part of Protestant Europe, may be traced in several particulars.

1. The general standard of religious doctrine and practice in our country has been rising since the publication of this work. A spirit of inquiry into the great principles of Christianity has been more and more excited. The importance of religion—of vital religion has been more generally felt. The distinction between the form and the power of godliness has been better recognised. The idea of a purer Christianity has prevailed, and is still more and more prevailing. The general tone and character of religion, in short, has been elevated. Much, we know, remains to be done. Public sentiment is still far below the true standard. But we speak comparatively. We are now advanced far beyond the spot where we stood thirty years since.

As a proof of this we may observe, that much ground has been gained as to most of the peculiar truths of the gospel. Surely we must perceive, that the scriptural doctrine of the deep fall and corruption of our nature is much more generally admitted and preached than it was in the last generation. The necessity of the special influences of grace to the production of any thing spiritually good in man is also more generally acknowledged. We are far from saying that there is not much of defect and error on these and other great questions still, but we speak of facts as they are. Again, the fundamental and consolatory doctrine which perhaps most characterized the Reformation, justification by faith only, is now, after ages of contention, almost universally admitted. The favourite position, that faith and works conjointly justify man, is abandoned as no longer tenable, and the simple scriptural truth, that “works are the fruits of faith, and follow after justification,” is commonly taught. We stand now pretty generally, we think, on the ground to which Luther brought us, and on which our English Reformers planted their foot—the merits of our Lord Jesus Christ, as the exclusive cause of our pardon and acceptance with God. Once more, as to the vital question of the operations of the blessed Spirit, a large advance has taken place. Let any one contrast the secret scorn with which the influence of the Holy Spirit was too much treated in the last age, with the reverence now entertained for it—let him contrast the timidity, the apprehension, the concealment, which then obscured the beams of this vivifying truth, with the clear and scriptural effulgence which now surrounds it—let him weigh the plain declarations of the necessity of the Holy Spirit's grace, of the necessity of true conversion to God, of a spiritual life, and of daily supplies of influences from above, which are now made—and he will perceive the striking difference. We are aware that the Baptismal Controversy, as it respects the grace conveyed by the Sacrament, and the use of the term Regeneration, is not yet composed; but the progress of real piety is what we are pointing out; and even on this particular difficulty, it is evident, we think, that the essential points are becoming less and less disputed. Again, the standard of holiness, the details of Christian duty, the doctrine of morals, the obligation of the holy law, the necessity of effort and vigilance and prayer and self-denial and separation from the world, are all in progress. The divorce, once too common, between doctrine and practice is now much more rarely met with. Barren orthodoxy, a cold evangelical creed, and the Antinomian perversion of truth, are by far less frequent than formerly.

These remarks apply of course chiefly to our national church. But so far as we can judge, we think similar ones may be made on the prevailing theology of the orthodox bodies separated from it. The standard of pure evangelical doctrine and practice is rising, and attendant excesses and errors are less considerable, far less considerable, than they were.

2. In the next place, a spirit of moderation and charity is now apparent amongst those various parties and subdivisions that exist, and will exist during the infirmity of the militant church, which was unknown thirty years since. Controversy has subsided.* The irritation of disputes on the Divine Decrees (a deep unfathomable) has been suffered to expire; and far more practical questions, and conducted in a better temper—that on the grace of the Holy Spirit, for example—have occupied the place. The wall of partition between the Christian bodies not of the Establishment, and the Establishment itself, has been a good deal broken down, and a mutual intercourse of kindness and respect cultivated. A generous rivalry in doing good and saving souls, and diffusing the gospel, seems now the confessed duty of all. The natural but unhappy jealousy, also, between the great body of the national clergy and those who have been, by a sort of anomaly, termed in reproach, evangelical, (a name which they are far from assuming,) is rapidly disappearing. On the one side, information and piety and energy are augmenting; and the conformity of the other to the scriptural standard of faith and holiness is more justly appreciated, and any unnecessary peculiarities allowed to die away; whilst a spirit of love is uniting the two classes. Every year almost, distinguished persons arise in the church, who carry the great body of the clergy forward insensibly, and thus advance that general tone of evangelical sentiment for which our Author in the last age stood forth almost the single defender, and which, when generally diffused, will annihilate the distinction which has so long been the reproach to our national church.

3. The progress of real piety, again, may be traced

* The valuable labours of the “Christian Observer” have much contributed to this result.

in the greater attention paid to subjects connected with morals and religion, in the nation generally, and especially in the Houses of Parliament. We speak of what lies open to daily observation. The admission of Christianity into India; the establishment of episcopal sees in the East and West Indies; the abolition of the slave trade, and mitigation of slavery; the investigations into the sufferings of missionaries in our colonies, and into the state of prisoners in our own country;* the erection of churches in our populous parishes by national grants; the encouragement of education; the abolition of the Lottery; the intense interest manifested for the moral improvement of Ireland, are most of them questions which, thirty years since, no one would have supposed it possible to bring before parliament with success. Much, much undoubtedly, must still be lamented in the religious information and temper of the legislature, but of the progress actually made, we conceive, no reasonable doubt can be entertained. Again, the active piety of no inconsiderable number of individuals amongst the nobility and gentry, the dedication which they make of their time and wealth and influence to the honour of God, their open and consistent profession of the peculiar doctrines of the gospel, the aid they lend to our great religious societies, and the opposition which they cheerfully endure in their own circles for the sake of the cause of Christ, are points not to be omitted in this enumeration, incomplete as it is.

And does not the diffusion of general education, also, as connected with religion, speak the language of hope as to the state of public feeling? What will not our National, and Infant, and Lancasterian Schools produce before another generation has elapsed, or rather, what are they not producing already? A source of religious principle is thus early opened in the youthful mind; talent is developed in unison with the knowledge and habits essential to its safe direction, and the national character is rising.

* It is impossible for us not to notice here the surprising effects of the labours of Mrs Fry, who has been called, not unjustly, the apostle of women.

4. Once more, the increased diligence and piety of our students at the universities deserve observation. This is like the spring in the year. All teems with the promise of piety and devotedness in our future ministers of religion. The spirit, likewise, which prevails in the most influential bodies amongst the seniors in our universities, the higher standard of preaching there encouraged, the vigilance exercised over the morals of the students, the strictness of the divinity examinations, are all so many pledges of important good, and mark the progress of the revival of religion. The number indeed in these classes is not great, and might seem scarcely to require a distinct notice; but the effects are incalculable. One generation of pious and devoted candidates for ordination is the blossom of the next age.

5. The increase of piety and simplicity in our parochial clergy is only the consequence of what has been stated in the preceding remarks. It is the seedplot of divine grace among our population. The pious minister of religion, of whatever confession, but more especially the pious parish priest, is the guide, the comforter, the friend, the pastor of his flock. The streams of living water flow from his doctrine and his life, for the refreshment and salvation of the people. To this branch of our subject belongs a respectful notice of that very observable progress in the activity and piety of the dignitaries of the church, which unites them more closely with charitable institutions, opens their affections to their pious clergy, leads to the better distribution of patronage, and augments the strictness of the previous examination of candidates for holy orders.

6. And what shall we say of the voluntary associations for the diffusion of the gospel abroad and at home, which are the glory of our day, and which have reflected so much light and energy on our ministers and our people ! What can mark the progress of a revival of religion if the increased exertions of Christians in disseminating the Holy Scriptures, in planting missions, in calling back the houses of Israel and Judah to their Messiah, in scattering profusely prayer-books and homilies, and religious tracts and treatises in every quarter, in translating for foreign nations and barbarian tribes the records of our faith, do not prove it ! We confess we dwell with delight on these effects of the blessing of God on his church in the present day. We firmly believe such a period of light and exertion has not appeared, taking it altogether, since the days of the apostles. We can conceive of nothing more pregnant with future blessings. The different societies, both within and without the church, almost equally excite our joy. Had there been only one society, or societies in only one division of the Church of Christ, torpor would have soon, as in former instances, benumbed our efforts. It is competition, and rival exertions, and the division of labour, and mutual emulation for the dissemination of the faith, under the protection of a mild and beneficent Government, and with the concurrence of a tolerant Established Church, that affords the fairest prospect, considering man as he is, and the visible Church as it is and ever has been, for accomplishing the conversion of mankind.

7. And here can we fail to add the proof of reviving grace, which appears so distinctly in the raising up of suitable instruments, in various departments of labour, for carrying on the different tasks essential to the main result? Who formed the noble individuals that have taken the lead in the present day? How few in number comparatively! and yet suppose them withdrawn, and every thing would be at a stand. Authors, compilers, translators, travelers, agents, artists, schoolmasters, catechists, missionaries, secretaries, presidents, public speakers,—we are appealing to those who know the interior of our great societies,—have been raised up in a remarkable manner to fill their respective posts, and have displayed the appropriate talents which those posts required—a sure criterion of a divine effusion of mercy on the Church.*

8. The concurrence of the secular powers in different nations, to succour the infant cause of the Bible Societies and Missions—the aid afforded by our own Government in their home and foreign stations—the position of those stations, scattered on the borders of the chief Heathen and Mahommedan countries—the prodigious influence of the British name in the East, with the augmenting extent of her empire—the invention in the arts, more particularly in those connected with the press—are all subsidiary, but important particulars in such an inquiry as the present.

* We might add the noble list of officers in the army and navy who support the cause of religion wherever they are stationed. The Naval and Military Bible Society, which in 1804 had only two naval and military officers on the list of contributors and friends, in 1814 numbered 109, and in 1825, 315—each of whom may be considered as a herald and agent of truth, raised up by Almighty God, from a class least likely, ordinarily speaking, to yield such characters.

9. The preparation in the mind of the Heathen and Mahommedan states, for the reception of pure Christianity, is another mark of a divine interference. The world seems in movement. Dissatisfaction with existing error, inquiry after the records of the Christian faith, openness to conviction, esteem for the British character, are indications not to be mistaken. The opposition of the courts of Rome and Constantinople has only issued in the wider spread of the religious knowledge which they naturally enough wished to extinguish, and lights up brighter expectations as to the future.

10. Again, the protest which has been entered against the peculiar corruptions of the Church of Rome, in the late controversies, cannot but be regarded as a mark of the advance of the revival of real religion. We speak not of the questions connected with the political condition of the members of that church in Ireland. We may, or may not be right in this respect. Probably there has been, and is, much of what is wrong in that part of our conduct. But we speak of the decided spirit which the Protestants have manifested against the religious abominations of Popery. We speak of the bold and manly exposure of her antiscriptural usurpations which has been made before the eyes of the nation. We speak of the hallowed talent and zeal kindled against her idolatry, her superstition, her tyranny over the conscience, her prohibition of the reading of the Bible, her opposition to the civil and religious liberty of mankind. In this view, also, the open stand made against the Apocryphal Books, though connected with some painful circumstances, is of real importance.

11. The dissemination of knowledge on the subject of Divine Prophecy, after every deduction that must be made on the score of rashness or miscalculation, is a token of reviving piety among us. "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things that are written therein, for the time is at hand." The study of prophecy, in the best sense, is assuredly increasing, and this is one symptom of the rising zeal and activity of the Church; for prophecy shines as a lamp in a dark place—prophecy cheers the feeble efforts of our early missions—prophecy animates with hope of Divine assistance—prophecy explains the greatest mystery in the aspect of things, the Western and Eastern apostacies—prophecy holds out to us a series of times, which, by every calculation, must ere long run out—prophecy encourages, warrants, animates the efforts now making at home and abroad for the conversion of the world.

12. We must add to these particulars the absence of persecution in our country. Real Christians are not forced into privacy—are not harassed by prohibitory laws—not involved in bitter hatred, and goaded by open injustice and public calumny. This is a certain criterion of a revival of mercy to a nation. The sincere servants of God are allowed to preach and write and labour and extend themselves peaceably far and wide, “none making them afraid.” This marks a Divine favour to the government and country which affords such protection. Popery has ever persecuted. Mahomedanism persecutes. Proud, declining, nominal Protestantism, is inclined to persecute. Infidelity and philosophy, after all their boasts, persecute. The revived Christian doctrine proclaims its Author by its meekness, its tolerance, its benevolence, its charity, its patience.

13. One point remains: the progress of personal religion amongst us—the actual increase of the Divine influence, and of its holy effects in our neighbourhoods and parishes and congregations. Much, we allow, very much still remains to be done; but surely we cannot fail to observe the large advance which has taken place in the general efficiency of our religious services during the last thirty years. Without this indeed all the other criteria of a revival of religion would be fallacious. It is the diffusion of personal and family piety—of holiness in our domestic circles, of conversion to God, of love to the Saviour, devotedness to His service, watchfulness and self-denial, circumspection and zeal—which denotes the abiding mercy of God with us, and prepares for every future blessing.

Let now these particulars be laid together, and we think the reader will perceive something of the progress of the revival of religion, since the publication of the Work before us. It is not one or two of these particulars which would constitute this advance, if separately considered; it is the concurrence of them all—it is the conjoined effect of this renewed life and grace within the Church, and of these favourable circumstances without it—which marks the finger of God, and forms an era of peculiar grace.

The impression would be deepened, if we were to review the correspondent progress in real piety which has been made during the same period in some of the Protestant Churches in France and Germany and other parts of Europe, as well as in the extensive and powerful American States. But enough has been said for the purpose in hand.

We must, however, observe, before we pass on, that extreme caution is necessary not to overstate these favourable appearances, and not to forget the numerous defects and sins which are still prevalent in the visible Church. The ground actually gained is indeed considerable, compared with the point from which we set out half a century since; but let us not deceive ourselves. The distance between our present attainments, and the true elevation of primitive faith and love, is still immense. There is a mass of hatred, of bitter, determined hatred against evangelical truth and holiness lurking in our country. Appearances of discord and decline are, alas! not wanting even in our best designs and projects. The present promise of things in the Church seems precisely to be that which may, with the Divine blessing, speedily ripen into a glorious harvest, and may also, if our sins should provoke the Divine displeasure, be as quickly blighted and disappear. Enough has been vouchsafed to our prayers to encourage us to redoubled vigilance and efforts and hope, and yet enough is still unaccomplished to lead us to deeper humiliation and more fervent prayers for the increased effusion of Divine mercy. But this leads us to our last topic.

V. Some suggestions as to the manner in which this revival may be further advanced.

And here it is with no affected diffidence that we profess our incompetence and apprehensions. The very attempt to speak on such a subject affixes the charge almost of presumption on those who make it: and yet we have been drawn on so far, that we must venture on a few hints, in sincere humility, we trust, and simplicity of heart.

1. Thankfulness, then, to God, for what he has already wrought, must be the first duty in circumstances like ours. We know who has said, "He that offereth praise glorifieth me." Let our Saviour God have ALL the glory of what his merey hath vouchsafed. Let us not think too much of men or instruments or second causes. "The work that is done upon earth, God doeth it himself." We are in danger of self-complacency, of flattering distinguished individuals, of looking to external splendour and outward circumstances and human policy. Let us pierce through all this, that we may approach the throne of our God, and there prostrate ourselves in humble adoration and praise. "Let no flesh glory in his presence; but he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord."*

* In this view, we are not without apprehension that we may have been betrayed into expressions too warm, and which, to strangers to the Work, may have the appearance of flattery, in speaking of the volume which has given occasion to these pages.

2. Peculiar caution against the dangers to which our situation exposes us may next be mentioned. The great revival we have been describing has been brought about and extended during a state of outward tranquillity and peace in the Church, at least so far as our own country is concerned. The imminent dangers springing from such a state, must be recognised and watched against with wakeful jealousy, if the revival is to advance. Religion is extended no farther, in fact, than the actual renewal and sanctification of the heart and nature of individuals are extended. Let any one look into the declining Asiatic churches of the Apocalypse, and see how they fell, and then let him tremble for himself and the churches now. A temporizing spirit, the fear of man, conformity to the doubtful practices of the world, a dread of the offence of the cross, self-seeking, vanity, neglect of family and closet devotion, inconsistencies of temper and conduct, the love of pleasure and indulgence, a tendency to display and ostentation, apathy and coldness of heart as to the real interests of Christ's kingdom, delight in detecting and exposing the faults of the pious and active—these, and the like sins, are the peculiar snares of a day of external ease; and unless they are sedulously guarded against by ministers and people, the Holy Spirit will be grieved and withdraw from us; and, with him, all our prospects and hopes will vanish as a dream. Besides these personal dangers, there are more national and public ones,—the violation of the holy Sabbath by Sunday company, Sunday traveling, Sunday business, and more especially by SUNDAY NEWSPAPERS,* is one of our most flagrant national sins, and is weakening we fear the good habits of former days in many religious families. The connection with religious societies from inferior and secular motives only—the neglect of family duties by the plea of public exertions—the separation of education from direct evangelical principles—the excessive spirit of enterprise and ambition in commercial pursuits, are perils of a public description against which we must use every fit precaution.

Our sincere aim has been to record only what we consider to be FACTS; and with the direct design of ascribing the entire praise to the One Giver of every blessing. Still we stand condemned, if there be a single word which can fairly be considered as partaking of adulation.

3. A higher reverence for the Bible is a third duty of this period of revived piety. If the present hopeful appearances are to be realized, men's fallible writings must be of less weight than they have been, and GOD'S BOOK of infinitely greater. Far as we are advanced in honouring, and studying, and upholding the inspired word of God, (and in this view the Bible Society is of incomparable value, and has in it the seeds of future blessings—blessings which its warmest supporters are little able to appreciate,) yet, we apprehend, we have scarcely passed the threshold of the great subject. The unutterable importance of deeply imbibing, and honestly following, the very spirit of the Bible, in all its parts and statements, can only be fitly illustrated by consider-

* This is an evil of such portentous magnitude, and so new to this Protestant nation, that we can omit no opportunity of pointing it out to the reprobation of every friend to his country and to the interests of religion. Every month almost witnesses some accession to the list of these open profanations of the Lord's day. From London, the plague is spreading to our provincial towns.

ing the fatal mischiefs which have sprung from the practical neglect of this duty. All the superstitions of Popery are merely comments of men, superseding the declarations of God. Socinianism is only a different and more fatal perversion of human reason to the neglect of the Bible. The contentions of churches, the heats of disputants, the excesses of systems of theology, all spring from multiplying and magnifying the deductions of fallible men, and putting those deductions in place of the Bible. The general and charitable outlines of fundamental truth indeed, which are drawn up in the Confessions and Articles of the Protestant Churches, are necessary as matter of discipline; but the insisting dogmatically and exclusively upon these, to the neglect of the sacred Scriptures themselves, from which they are derived, is the evil of which we complain. We conceive all our churches are faulty here. To exalt the divine Revelation more and more, in its plain and obvious sense, is the way to bring down the further blessing of the Holy Spirit, is the way to heal divisions, to propagate a sound and holy doctrine, to advance genuine unity and love. Let Lord Bacon's principle, which opened the way to all the discoveries in natural philosophy, be applied to divinity, and correspondent improvements may be expected. Instead of systems, let us seek phenomena. Instead of what agrees with principles, principles themselves. Instead of forcing Nature and Scripture, let us follow them, interrogate them, obediently yield to them. Instead of framing general laws and notions, let us be content with collecting separate facts and statements, and proceed on cautiously from these towards general conclusions, in the way of induction and experiment, not in the manner of hypothesis and abstract reasoning. Thus will God's word at length, in the hand of its divine Author, become the acknowledged standard and touchstone of truth, the grand instrument of illumination and sanctification to mankind. There is nothing which we should not hope for from the honest, intelligent, paramount use of the Bible, and the Bible only, in the Church of Christ. All the grand corruptions of Christianity have proceeded from men's closing that sacred Book; its revival, then, must be accompanied by their opening it again in humble faith, and implicitly following its unerring dictates.

4. A bold practical avowal of the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel is an inference from the preceding remark. If the country is to be awakened, and the world converted, it must be by a full unshrinking exhibition of Christ crucified. The deep fall and impotency of man, the person and glory of Christ, the Deity and operations of the Holy Ghost, justification by faith only, regeneration and progressive sanctification by the Spirit, holy love, obedience the fruit and evidence of faith,—all centering in the cross, and emanating from the atonement and righteousness, and conspiring to illustrate the power and grace, of our Lord Jesus Christ. This is the doctrine which the Holy Spirit will bless. A timid, obscure gospel is no gospel at all;—it wants both the principles which console and those which save;—it never has, it never will effect considerable things in the propagation of truth. The simplicity of the cross of Christ, with the mighty power of grace which accompanies it, is all we need, and all that God has determined to use to the diffusion of his mercy throughout the world.

5. In the next place, let each individual be increasingly active in his personal exertions, and in his union and co-operation with others. The effects of voluntary association in a free, enlightened, opulent, religious nation, are incalculable. The power of the greatest monarchs is feeble compared with the combined energies of men marshaled in societies, subdividing labour amongst themselves—collecting the thousand smaller contributions of the poor—eliciting and employing talents and piety wherever they appear—watching for opportunities in every quarter of the world, and entering in at each point that opens—acting on simple broad grounds of immediate duty—assisting, consoling, animating one another. Already we have seen wonders produced by the aggregation of numbers, who, if they had exerted themselves separately, could have effected comparatively nothing. Let our great societies be extended and multiplied—let voluntary co-operation be pushed on to its utmost limits—let the vast unoccupied tracts in our own country be brought into cultivation—let every one be induced to cast in his contribution, and add his exertions,—and what may not our Bible, and Missionary, and Religious Book and Tract Associations accomplish? One penny a week from a population like ours of fifteen millions, would produce an annual sum of above three millions of pounds sterling, more than six times the amount of all our present charitable incomes united!

But we must exert ourselves individually as well as in societies. Let each Christian cast about for methods of active, decisive, persevering, wise, self-denying service in his family, his connections, his neighbourhood. Let him not despise smaller acts of mercy and goodness. These are the only elements of the greatest results. Pride and ignorance bid us wait for important occasions; humility creates them by occupying the numerous though inconsiderable opportunities of daily occurrence.—With these public and personal exertions, let an increased attention to private devotion and the cultivation of the heart be joined. Then all will proceed safely. Communion with God will nourish the source whence public efforts flow, and will correct, insensibly, the dangers which attend them.

6. A higher tone of Christian love is, again, an indispensable requisite to further advances in a revival of religion. Some persons think we have made great advances in this heavenly temper already. We are of a different opinion. We have admitted, indeed, that a considerable progress in it may be observed; but this is comparative. We conceive there is no one part of the true imitation of Christ in which we are more defective still. That is not charity which requires our brother to think and act with us, and then promises him our support. That is not charity which condescends, on a few occasions, to suspend the warfare of parties. That deserves not the name of charity, which conceals only the envy or suspicion which we nourish towards a class of Christians different from our own. Nor, on the other hand, is that charity which calls for an impracticable and confused mixture of all creeds and disciplines, and effaces the boundaries of conscience and the rights of private judgment. Much less is that charity which magnifies and obtrudes subordinate points on occasions not calling for them, or beyond the occasions which call for them. But that is charity and love—oh! may the Spirit of love pour more of it into our hearts—which, leaving each Christian to think for himself, and rejoicing in the good which others do, and honestly believing they act from conscience towards God as well as ourselves, and knowing that differences of judgment are the constant attendant on the infirmities of the militant Church, and acknowledging that they are permitted for the very trial of that temper of kindness which without them would have little room for exertion, and renouncing the chimerical and fruitless scheme of reducing the visible Church to one model of discipline, or one confession of faith, takes the wiser and happier course of UNITING ALL HEARTS, of co-operating with others in every practicable method of enlarging the common ground where all agree, and narrowing the spots where they differ, and thus advancing the general interests of the kingdom of God. In heaven, all who have loved our Lord Jesus Christ, and served him in sincerity, will be ONE. Let them approach to this state more and more on earth. Let them rise up to the primitive standard, so beautifully described in the Acts of the Apostles, when “all were of one heart and of one soul.” Let them realize the sublime anticipation of the Saviour himself, “That they all may be ONE; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be ONE in us, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me.”

Nor is that essential branch of charity to be overlooked which consists in dispensing our wealth and influence and time for the good of the Church. Much progress has been made here. The munificence, the hallowed munificence of thousands in our rich and free country is a sign of the times for good. Let this spirit be diffused. Let our commerce and wealth, as the prophet expresses it, be “holiness of the Lord.” Let the delight of dispersing abroad, instead of hoarding by covetousness, or wasting by display and self-indulgence, be sought for as the true use of riches. What might not then, by the blessing of God, be effected?

7. But united prayer for the larger effusion of the grace of the Holy Spirit, though it is a point which has been frequently pressed of late, is too important to be wholly omitted here. We are disposed to do any thing rather than to pray. And yet, as the labours of the husbandman are utterly vain in the natural world, except as God vouchsafes the genial softening showers, and shines out upon them with the cheering beams of day; so in the spiritual world, every exertion of all our societies united is hopeless, except as the God of grace vouchsafes the genial, fructifying influences of his Spirit, and shines upon them with the healing rays of the “Sun of Righteousness.” We find it generally observed, that though pious ministers are multiplying in every part of the kingdom, and good is doing in the conversion of souls, and a dew from above falls pretty widely on their fields of labour—yet there is no where a rich effusion of the Spirit. Our ministers do not “come forth in the FULNESS of the blessing of the gospel of Christ.” One and another, indeed, is awakened in each congregation; and, in a course of years, a small body of pious persons is formed around the minister; and even for such a measure of success, ardent praises are due to God. But we do not see “GREAT GRACE” upon our parishes—there are no “showers of blessing”—our own hearts, as ministers, are not “enlarged”—our word is not “with the Holy Ghost, and with power”—numbers are not aroused and converted—“a great multitude” are not “obedient to the faith.” That is, we require, we indispensably need, a large further effusion of the grace of the Holy Spirit. All languishes, and will languish, till united, fervent, humble, persevering prayer be made of the Church to God for his promised grace. Nothing can fill our sails, nor bear up our richly-freighted vessel amidst the rocks and shoals which impede her course, nor carry her on triumphantly and gloriously to her destined haven, but the wind from heaven, the favouring gale, the divine inspiration and afflatus from above. Oh, when will the Church act fully on her principles, and devote those hours to prayer which are now dissipated on inferior and doubtful objects! When, when will her humble supplications be addressed with fervour and importunity for the ONE BLESSING which comprehends or will ensure every other! “The only want at present,” says an acute observer, after detailing the advancement of knowledge, and the immense opportunities which England possesses, “is the want of a WILL—the want of a RESOLUTION of making efforts proportioned to the end to be obtained.”* That is, the main blessing now required is the more abundant GRACE of Him who is the Divine Illuminator and Sanctifier of fallen man—the sacred Comforter of the Church—the peculiar Promise and characteristic gift and surpassing glory of the New Testament dispensation.

* “The advancement of Society in Knowledge and Religion.” By James Douglas, Esq. p. 325. A book deeply interesting, and

8. Hope of great things is the last suggestion we would venture to make. We cannot reasonably look for the accomplishment of the vast scope of prophecy and promise, till our faith and hope are invigorated to expect it. We judge of God from sense, and nature, and past periods of the Church, and present difficulties: let us judge of him by the word of his truth, by the power of his grace, by the efficacy of the cross of his only-begotten Son, by the almighty energy of his Spirit. Let us take our measures of hope and desire, not from ourselves and our puny wisdom and might, but from God and his omnipotent and all-glorious power. The progress of knowledge and information has just cleared away the rubbish accumulated round the Christian temple—controversy, and heat, and division, have had their day—direct preparations are now, at length, making for the conversion of the world—the machinery is putting together—the main questions are practically understood—the world is “labouring and travailing,” as it which, we trust, the Author will follow up by similar publications, or an enlarged edition of the present. We can conceive of few persons better qualified to devote themselves to the high task of combining scattered information, directing to new scenes of labour, and instructing and animating his fellow-Christians; especially in the various topics of a geographical, historical, and philosophical nature, connected with the diffusion of religious knowledge throughout the world, than this able and lively writer. We owe much to his suggestions in the course of this Essay, which we take this opportunity of acknowledging.

were, for the moment of deliverance—our own country unites almost every conceivable advantage for disseminating the gospel throughout the world—the roll of prophecy is developing itself—the signs of providential dispensation accumulate around us—all calls us to HOPE—all calls on us to “lift up our heads” to welcome the “redemption which is drawing nigh.”

For the third time has the Church been led to expect the close of things, and the accomplishment of the word of prophecy. At the era of the emperor Constantine, Christians looked up to see the empire first acknowledging the doctrine of Christ, and then taking possession of the nations.* Again, at the period of the blessed Reformation, hope kindled at the threatened overthrow of Popery, and anticipated the conversion of mankind. But the time was not then come—centuries of darkness and conflict had to intervene—the Church had various important lessons to learn—“the Man of Sin” had not developed all his hideous deformity. In a word,—science, and literature, and arts, and commerce, and peace, and almost universal empire, as to the outward order of things, were to prepare for the second coming of Christ, as they did for the first.

Now hope plumes her wings with more humble distrust of herself indeed, and yet with more confidence and joy, because the word of prophecy within the sanctuary seems to correspond with the leadings and openings of Providence without, to pronounce THAT THE TIME IS AT HAND. Every thing augurs

* Even as early as the second century, in the time of Ignatius and Polycarp, the hope of the consummation of all things was excited; but the expectation was much more widely diffused in the fourth century.

the coming of our Lord. The three synchronical events of the fall of the Eastern and Western Antichrists, and the conversion of the Jews, marked by numerous independent but converging predictions, cannot be distant. Hope is, therefore, the “helmet” to be put on now, if ever, in entering on this holy enterprise. The disproportion, between the ordinary means of the first Christians, and their success in propagating the gospel, was incomparably greater, than between the means which Christian nations now possess, and the general conversion of mankind. But even if this were not so, faith and hope rely on the power and grace of God, first to create the adequate instruments, and then to crown them with triumphant success.

May the writer of these pages be permitted to close the whole of the remarks which he has felt it his duty to offer on this great subject, by addressing a few words to two classes of his fellow-subjects and fellow-christians?

He would, in the first place, respectfully remind THE LEGISLATORS OF HIS COUNTRY, that the happiness and glory and safety of Britain are bound up with the question which we have been considering. This reflection naturally follows from the remarkable volume of our Author. “Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people.” The ruin of the greatest commercial states, whether of those recorded in Scripture or of those which profane annals have handed down to us, has sprung from corruption of manners, and contempt of God and religion. Nineveh, Tyre, Babylon, are beacons to us. Let us beware. Riches, luxury, fame in arms, prosperity, always tend to engender pride and selfishness, and lead on to fatal declines in national character. England has no prescriptive right to the power and wealth and numberless advantages which have been so profusely bestowed upon her since the appeal of our distinguished senator was made thirty years back. India has not been committed to us for nothing. The empire of the seas is not an irresponsible blessing. Our colonies, scattered in every clime, are not without corresponding claims upon us.* Our fame and glory in delivering oppressed Europe—our national freedom—our spirit of enterprise—our intercourse with every quarter of the globe—our augmented wealth—our skill in the sciences and arts—are not designed to be exclusive and barren advantages—ALL IS A TRUST—all calls on us to moral effort. The continuance of them entirely depends on the good pleasure of God. In one moment, if such were his will, the splendid scene would vanish; and national degradation, discord, feebleness, perplexity, ruin, (as we may too fearfully learn from late events,) would start up in its place. The revival of religion, now so widely extended demands of us renewed exertions. Legislators must act fully as Christians. The public mind expects this, and will bear them out in it. England must rise to her high destiny. If she remain stationary,—but she cannot remain stationary,—she will decline and perish, unless she press on in the noble career which Providence now opens before her.* He consults best for the GOOD of his country who labours to secure the divine protection—who speaks out boldly in her senate for God and religion—who protests against national sins, who moulds her laws to the divine precepts, who rouses her nobles and government to extensive and effectual moral improvements—who urges her on in the sacred course of religious feeling and exertion—who strengthens the foundations of her greatness, by consecrating her empire to the honour of God, and connecting it with the illumination, and conversion of mankind. Let the statesman, then, take at length the Scriptures into his hand, and purify and elevate his political projects, by the estimate which God takes of nations, and the view which He gives of the highest ends of their existence. Let him be deeply persuaded that every national sin fatally contributes to the dissolution of our power; whilst every act of reformation and piety goes to arrest the deadly gangrene, and infuses new life and vigour into the whole body of the state.

* O how piercing are the cries of the enslaved and oppressed African!—how surely do they enter the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth!

And may the writer next be allowed to address, with unaffected respect and deference, HIS BRETHREN OF THE CLERGY? It is not on legislators, but on ministers of religion, that the progress of a revival of piety chiefly depends. Never did such an opportunity present itself, for our national Church becoming a blessing to mankind. The station, character, talents, learning, and just influence of the clergy, precisely qualify them for taking the helm, now that the great tide of spiritual religion is flowing in upon us. In order to this, however, they must have themselves correct and well-fixed principles of vital Christianity. To understand thoroughly the Gospel of Christ in its peculiar grace and power, to feel and live habitually under its holy influence, to preach and instruct the people in its transforming truths, this is their high vocation. The Church of England is, after all, only one means of maintaining and propagating the Gospel. Except as this is done, her great office is overlooked, and the discharge of inferior obligations can never remedy the evil. And is it not, he would ask, but too clear, from the effects of general education among our people, from the activity and talents of the various bodies separated from the Church, from the bolder front of the Roman Catholic superstitions, and from the hostility of no inconsiderable party in the legislature, that nothing can long support the Church of England but her freely admitting the light which is pouring around her; and not only reflecting that light herself, but aiding in sending forth its glories throughout the world? The holy renewal already so much diffused in the Church of England must go on yet more deeply and extensively, or a disruption may be too surely anticipated. In a free Protestant country, and in a day like the present, the strength of the National Establishment is not its protecting statutes, its ancient edifices, its rights, its emoluments—important and necessary as these are—but its purity, its holiness, its zeal for the gospel, its activity, its charity. The world is now in movement. The nations are waiting for the gospel. The Eastern and Western apostacies totter to their fall. England, in general, is awaking to her duty and her privilege. And if the pure evangelical doctrines of the Reformation be not still more decidedly espoused by her bishops and dignitaries, and taught and propagated by her priesthood and missionaries, “help will come in from some other quarter;” other bodies of Christians amongst us will be elevated to the post of honourable service, and the vast designs of the divine mercy will be accomplished by some less conspicuous but more willing instruments.

* “For the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted.”—Isa. lx, 12.

These are bold and startling truths, he is aware; but if they are truths, as the writer is deeply persuaded is the case, he is the best friend to the Church of England who shrinks not from avowing them.

At present it is not too late. The National Church ought and may—and we trust and believe will—rise to her obvious duty. The body of our people are attached to her sound and holy forms of devotion; her articles and homilies are the most purely evangelical of any of the Reformed communities; the spirit generally prevalent in her hierarchy is tolerant and charitable; her capacities of extensive usefulness are daily multiplying; in proportion as her ministers discharge their vocation aright, affection and respect for their persons, esteem for their instructions, and a cheerful, fixed adherence to the communion of the Church at whose altars they serve, spontaneously follow. Every thing combines to urge the clergy forward. Let them not look back, to dispute about the past. Let them not stop to settle to what extent a decline had taken place among us. The fact sufficiently speaks for itself. And who can look impartially for one instant into the history of the Jewish Church, or read the remonstrances of the prophets, or remember the apostolic warnings to the first Christian converts, or recur to the case of the falling Churches of the Apocalypse—to say nothing of the uniform testimony of Ecclesiastical History since,—without acknowledging that declines in National Churches are the perpetual effect of human depravity? No personal reflections are conveyed by such statements; nor is any presumptuous claim implied on the part of those who make them. The one question is, What is truth—what is the Gospel—what the call of divine mercy—what the circumstances of the times—what the necessity with which we are urged—what the duty of each one in aiding the general result? And these considerations all invite, at the present juncture, with a force never before paralleled, the Established Clergy to the discharge of their peculiar office as heralds of the gospel of Christ. As their guide in such a course, let them take in hand the writings of the men who have fought the battle of Christianity in somewhat similar periods. Let them imbibe the spirit of Cyprian or Augustine. Let them meditate on the magnanimous character of Luther, and the noble army of Reformers. Let them take up afterwards the milder, but kindred appeal of the Author whose work we have been reviewing. Let them, above all, study the sacred Scriptures themselves, and drink into the very mind of the Apostles and Evangelists. Let them do this honestly and diligently; adding fervent and persevering prayers to God for the guidance of his Spirit—and the result may be anticipated. They will be brought, as it were, into a new world. New views will open before them; new feelings agitate, new hopes enliven, new motives impel them. All the prejudices and fears and objections formerly lurking in their breasts will yield to the overpowering force and dignity of truth. Distrust and apprehension will be turned into admiration and love.—What more? Our reverend brethren will be beforehand with us in the conclusion to which we are hastening. Such a course will lead them to discern their truest interest, their real strength, their paramount obligation. A revival of piety, thus diffused, will SAVE THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. It will do more than this—though we are far from undervaluing this,—it will bring her back to those doctrines and principles which her Reformers first asserted at the price of their blood; and it will thus make her, what she is so well adapted to become, the benevolent and charitable and tolerant leader of all that is good in our own country, as well as the herald of blessings yet untold to the most distant regions of the earth.

D. W.

ISLINGTON, October, 1826.

CONTENTS.

	Page
INTRODUCTION.—Author's Apology, Design of the Work,	87

CHAPTER I.

INADEQUATE CONCEPTIONS OF THE IMPORTANCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

The popular notions concerning the importance of Christianity extremely inadequate,	91
Religious ignorance criminal,	96
Unreasonable to expect to become proficient in Christianity without inquiry and pains,	97
Scripture representations of the importance of Christianity,	98
The maxim, that it is of no importance what a man believes, exposed,	100
Also the maxim, that sincerity is all in all,	100
True sincerity, what included in it,	103
Concluding reflections,	105

CHAPTER II.

CORRUPTION OF HUMAN NATURE.

SECT. I.—Inadequate conceptions of the Corruption of Human Nature.

Popular notions concerning human corruption,	105
The different lessons on this subject which Christianity teaches, proved by the contrast between what we might expect from man, and what we find him practise,	106
First, in the most polished nations of antiquity,	108
Next, in the inhabitants of the New World on its first discovery,	109
Next, in the general state of the Christian world,	110
Lastly, even among true Christians,	114
The argument summed up and enforced,	115
The Scripture representation of human corruption,	117

SECT. II.—Evil Spirit.—Natural state of Man.

	Page
Existence and agency of the Evil Spirit, though plainly taught in Scripture, generally exploded,	118
Nothing unreasonable in this doctrine,	119
Scripture representations of the Supreme Being calculated to inspire awe,	120
The same awful impressions excited by the divine threatenings and punishments recorded in Scripture, and by the moral order of the world,	121
Christianity breaks in,	123
Practical importance and uses of the doctrine of human corruption,	124
Practical advice in relation to this subject,	125

SECT. III.—Corruption of Human Nature.—Objection.

The objection, that our corruption and weakness being natural to us, will be excused or allowed for, stated and considered,	126
The objection how best treated,	127
Fallacy of this objection proved by Scripture,	129
Danger of admitting the above objection,	129
Humility becomes man,	131
Folly of busying ourselves with what is above our comprehension, and neglecting what is plain and practical,	131

CHAPTER III.

CHIEF DEFECTS OF THE RELIGIOUS SYSTEM OF THE BULK OF PROFESSED CHRISTIANS IN WHAT REGARDS OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST AND THE HOLY SPIRIT—WITH A DISSERTATION CONCERNING THE USE OF THE PASSIONS IN RELIGION.

SECT. I.—Inadequate conceptions concerning our Saviour and the Holy Spirit.

Leading doctrines concerning Christ and the Holy Spirit, as stated in Scripture,	133
Inadequate conceptions in the above respects charged on the bulk of professed Christians, and enforced,	135
Great ingratitude hereby evinced,	138
Inadequate notions concerning the Holy Spirit,	139
Language of one who objects against the religious affections towards our Saviour,	140

	Page
And against the Holy Spirit's operations,	141
Reply to the above—unreasonableness of arguing from the abuse of a thing against its use,	143
Religious vulgarity, not to be too much disgusted by it, . . .	145

SECT. II.—On the admission of the Passions into Religion.

The opinion, that the affections are misplaced in religion, discussed and refuted,	147
By reason of the thing,	147
By the nature of man,	148
By the authority of the Scriptures and of Scripture charac- ters,	149
True test and measure of the religious affections,	152
Religious affections different according to natural temper, . .	154
The affections not merely allowable in religion, but highly necessary, proved by analogy,	155
Christ the just object of our warm affections,	159
The objection, that we are not susceptible of affections to- wards an invisible Being, discussed,	160
Close contact between subject and object, necessary to pro- duce affection,	163
And sufficient to produce affection without sight,	164
This explains why public misfortunes affect us less than pri- vate or personal,	165
Means of strengthening our affection towards any object, . . .	166
Special grounds for the affections towards our Saviour, . . .	167
Divine help promised for producing religious affections, . .	168
Unreasonable conduct of objectors in this instance,	169
Appeal to facts, in proof of the reality of the religious affec- tions.—The martyrs of our own church, and the apostles, . . .	170

SECT. III.—Inadequate conceptions concerning the Holy Spirit's operations.

Scripture doctrine concerning the Holy Spirit's operations, . .	171
---	-----

SECT. IV.—Mistaken conceptions entertained by Nominal Christians of the terms of acceptance with God.

Inference afforded by the inadequate conceptions already noted, that mistaken conceptions commonly entertained of the means of a sinner's acceptance with God,	173
Different degrees of error,	174
Nature and proofs of this error,	175

	Page
Their fundamental misconception of the scheme and essential principle of the gospel,	177
Practical consequences and confirmation of the above misconception,	179
Condemnation of those who abuse the doctrine of grace,	181
Believing in Christ, what really implied in it,	182
Answer to objection, that we insist on metaphysical niceties,	183
The atonement and grace of Christ further pressed, as the subjects of our habitual regard,	184
Advantage justly taken by the Socinian of the above defects,	185
Practical application and address,	187

CHAPTER IV.

ON THE PREVAILING INADEQUATE CONCEPTIONS CONCERNING THE NATURE AND THE STRICTNESS OF PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY.

SECT. I.

Inadequate conceptions of the practical strictness required by Christianity generally prevalent,	190
Strong presumption against their notions,	193
Practical strictness of Christianity, as stated in Scripture,	195
Essential practical characteristic of true Christians,	196
Excellence of this principle,	198
The principle further opened, and shown to include the love of God,	198
The above principle of general application proved by the general terms of Scripture precepts,	199
Because resulting from relations common to all Christians,	202
Proof from the strong practical precepts of Scripture,	202
From God's requiring the heart,	203
From the glory of God being prescribed to us as our great object, and from the criminality of idolatry,	204
Extreme importance of the above considerations,	205

SECT. II.

Notions of practical Christianity generally prevalent,	207
They allow to religion only a partial jurisdiction,	208
Mischievous consequences of the above error,	209
The preceding statement confirmed by an appeal to various classes of nominal Christians, particularly of the higher order,	210
To the idle and dissipated,	212
To the votaries of sensual pleasure,	213
To the votaries of pomp and parade,	214

	Page
To the votaries of wealth and ambition,	215
To other classes,	216
Conclusion from the preceding review, and general fault in principle of all the above classes, that of transferring the heart from God to some other master,	218
Effects of the fundamental error above mentioned, on our judgments and practice in the case of others,	220
Further effects—religion degraded into a set of statutes, and quibbled away accordingly,	221
Another effect—religion placed in external actions, rather than habits of mind,	225
Yet the internal principle all in all,	225
As an evil resulting from the last mentioned error, Christian dispositions are not cultivated,	226
Instances of the preceding position—the generality forget that the Christian's life is a life of faith, and the true Christian's character in this respect,	227
Another distinction between nominal and real Christians, grounded on their different tastes and relish for religious subjects,	229
Proof drawn from the different manner of their employing the Sunday, and hints on that head,	231
Other internal defects, particularly in meekness and humility,	236

SECT. III.—On the Desire of human Estimation and Applause.—The generally prevailing opinions contrasted with those of the true Christian.

Universality of the desire of human estimation,	237
Common eulogium of this passion, both as to its nature and effects,	238
The above vindication questioned, even by the Pagan moralists,	241
Essentially defective and vicious nature of this passion, stated and explained in Scripture,	242
The world's commendations naturally misplaced,	244
Yet Christians taught in Scripture to cultivate with moderation the good opinion of the world, as an instrument of usefulness,	245
But points out a higher object of our ambition,	246
The inordinate love of human estimation generally prevalent, and the natural result,	247
Proofs from various considerations,—from the House of Commons,	249
From dueling,	249
Dueling, wherein its essential guilt consists,	250
A peculiarity in respect of this vice,	250

	Page
Commonly supposed value of the inordinate love of human estimation, questioned and disproved,	252
Reasoning of Christian moralists on this head often bear few traces of Christian morality,	253
Conduct of the true Christian in what regards the love of human estimation,	254
The most effectual method of moderating this love,	260
The true Christian guards against it on small, no less than on great occasions—in religion, no less than elsewhere,	263
Parting counsel to those who wish to bring this passion under due regulation, particularly to cultivate love and humility,	264

SECT. IV.—The generally prevailing error of substituting amiable Tempers and useful Lives in the place of Religion, stated and confuted; with hints to real Christians.

Amiable tempers and useful lives, their merit commonly exaggerated,	269
Stated to be the sum of religion, in substance, if not in name,	270
The distinction between morality and religion fatal,	270
The worth of amiable tempers, as estimated by the standard of unassisted reason, commonly overrated,	271
Many false pretenders to them,	272
Essentially defective nature of amiable tempers when not grounded in religion,	273
Their precarious and short duration,	275
Worth of useful lives, when estimated by the standard of unassisted reason, overrated,	275
The particular good of them more than countervailed by the general evil,	276
Worth of amiable tempers and useful lives, when not grounded in religion, proved to be greatly overrated, if estimated on Christian principles,	277
Their nature essentially corrupt,	279
The true Christian really the most amiable and useful character,	281
Admonitions to true Christians in the above respects,	282
To the naturally sweet-tempered and active,	283
To the naturally rough and austere,	284
Amiable tempers and useful lives, their just praise,	287
Apt to be deceived by them in our own case,	289
Danger to true Christians from mixing too much in worldly business,	290
Advice to those who suspect this to be their case,	290
Exquisite sensibility; its flimsy texture,	295
School of Rousseau and Sterne,	296
Sterne reprobated for indecency,	296

SECT. V.—Some other grand defects in the practical system of the bulk of Nominal Christians.

	Page
Inadequate conceptions generally prevalent of the guilt and evil of sin,	297
Proofs from our common language,	299
Different standard in the word of God,	300
Inadequate fear of God generally prevalent,	301
Sin, its baneful nature,	301
The future punishments of the wicked represented in Scripture as resulting from established relations,	302
State of the world at the time of the Deluge,	303
Inadequate sense of the difficulty of getting to heaven,	304
And of the necessity of acquiring a peculiar character, in order to fit us for it,	305
True Christian's efforts in this great work,	306
The Christian's life, represented under the character of a journey through a strange country,	308
The bulk of nominal Christians defective in the love of God,	310
Practical excellence of this quality,	311
The stage tried by this test,	311
Our referring the stage to this test justified by political analogy,	314
Bulk of nominal Christians defective in love to their fellow-creatures,	315
True marks of love of our neighbour,	316
The stage tried by reference to this test,	320

SECT. VI.—Grand defect.—Neglect of the peculiar Doctrines of Christianity.

Grand defect in the practical system of nominal Christians—their neglect of the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, and practical evils resulting therefrom, in the case of persons desirous of repentance and reformation,	322
Advice of modern religionists to persons of this description,	325
Advice given to them by the Holy Scriptures, and by the Church of England,	326
Extreme importance of this point—nature of true holiness, and Christian method of obtaining it,	327
Practical use made by the true Christian of the peculiar doctrines of Christianity,	327
The same use of them made in the Scriptures,	328
Use of the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, in enforcing its importance,	329
In enforcing an unconditional surrender of ourselves to God,	330
In enforcing the guilt of sin, and the dread of its punishment,	330
In promoting the love of God,	332
In promoting the love of our fellow-creatures,	333

	Pages
In promoting humility and meekness,	334
In promoting a spirit of moderation in earthly pursuits, and cheerfulness in suffering,	336
In promoting courage, confidence in danger, and heavenly-mindedness,	338
Grand distinction between nominal and real Christians, the place practically assigned by them to the peculiar doctrines of Christianity,	340

CHAPTER V.

ON THE EXCELLENCE OF CHRISTIANITY IN CERTAIN IMPORTANT PARTICULARS.—ARGUMENT WHICH RESULTS THENCE IN PROOF OF ITS DIVINE ORIGIN.

Consistency between the leading doctrines, and practical precepts of Christianity,	342
Between the leading doctrines of Christianity among each other,	343
Between the practical precepts of Christianity among each other,	343
Higher value set by Christianity, on moral than on intellectual attainments,	347
Intrinsic excellence of the practical precepts of Christianity,	350
Strong evidence of the truth of Christianity, afforded by the number and variety of the kinds of evidence by which its divine origin is proved,	351

CHAPTER VI.

BRIEF INQUIRY INTO THE PRESENT STATE OF CHRISTIANITY IN THIS COUNTRY, WITH SOME OF THE CAUSES WHICH HAVE LED TO ITS CRITICAL CIRCUMSTANCES.—ITS IMPORTANCE TO US AS A POLITICAL COMMUNITY, AND PRACTICAL HINTS FOR WHICH THE FOREGOING CONSIDERATIONS GIVE OCCASION.

Tendency of religion, and especially of Christianity, to promote the wellbeing of political communities,	352
A general standard or tone of moral practice in every community,	354
Christianity has raised this general standard or tone,	355
Effects on religion, of adversity and prosperity respectively,	356
Natural presumption concerning the present state of religion among us, afforded by the preceding consideration,	357
Causes from which the peculiarities of Christianity slide into disuse,	359

	Page
Still further decline to be expected,	361
The above presumptive statements justified by facts,	361
One cause assigned which has principally operated in reduc- ing Christianity among us to a mere system of ethics,	362
Christianity, such as it is stated in the present work, the re- ligion of the pillars of our church,	363
Its corruptions accelerated by the civil commotions of the last century,	364
The peculiar doctrines of Christianity at length almost left out of the system: this position confirmed by an appeal to our best novels,	367
The literati of our days sceptically disposed,	368
Consequences to be expected,	369
The objection, that the author's system is so strict, that if it were to prevail the world could not go on, stated and re- futed,	370
Happy effects to us, as a political community, from the pre- valence of vital Christianity ,	373
The position, that Christianity is hostile to patriotism, op- posed,	375
Superior nature and extent of true Christian benevolence,	376
Christianity peculiarly adapted to promote the wellbeing of political communities, from its hostility to selfishness,	377
Political expedients for preventing the mischievous effects of selfishness on civil communities, and superior efficacy of Christianity in this respect,	378
Means by which Christianity produces the above effect,	379
Vital Christianity can alone produce them,	382
In the present circumstances of this country, we must either have vital Christianity, or we shall have none at all,	383
Appeal to experience, in confirmation of the above position,	385
Political good effects from the revival of vital Christianity among us, and bad ones from its further decline,	386
A state of great civilization no security against great moral corruption,	388
Practical hints for the conduct of men in power, suggested by the above statements,	389
No time for half measures.—A decided line of conduct called for,	390
Duty enforced on us of checking open profaneness, and, above all, of giving religious instruction to the rising gene- ration,	391
Evangelical Christianity alone likely to produce any real amendment,	392
The above remark pressed on the bishops, the clergy, and our universities,	393
Apology for having treated of religion so much with a view to its political effects,	394

CHAPTER VII.

PRACTICAL HINTS TO VARIOUS DESCRIPTIONS OF PERSONS.

SECT. I.

	Page
The common sort of Christianity does not deserve the name,	394
Some consideration preparatory to self-examination; one of them peculiarly awful,	395
Causes of self-deception suggested,	396
One cause of self-deception, the mistaking our merely outgrowing or changing our vices, for forsaking all sin; appeal to life,	397
Charge of being uncharitable repelled, and what really charity and uncharitableness,	400
Women naturally more disposed to religion than men; domestic advantages therefrom,	401
Innocent young people, the term how much abused,	404
The reformation held sufficient by the world, how much it falls short of true Christian regeneration,	405
Practical hints to such as, having hitherto been careless and irreligious, wish to become true Christians,	407
Excellent nature and practical benefits of humility,	411
Love enforced,	413
Base and mercenary nature of the religion of the bulk of nominal Christians, and opposite character of true Christianity,	414
The charge repelled, that we render Christianity a gloomy service,	416
Multiplied sources of pleasure to Christians,	417
Superior situation of true Christians over men of the world in point of comfort, especially in our days,	420

SECT. II.—Advice to some who profess their full Assent to the fundamental Doctrines of the Gospel.

A loose way of holding the true doctrines of Christianity too generally prevalent in our relaxed days,	422
Its danger and mischievous effects,	425
Watchfulness and diligence enforced; and the study of the lives of eminent Christians recommended,	426

SECT. III.—Brief observations addressed to Sceptics and Unitarians.

	Page
Presumption in favour of the truth of Christianity, from the greatest and wisest men having embraced it,	427
Infidelity gradually growing on young men as they advance in years,	428
The above natural history of scepticism confirmed by experience, and by the written lives of sceptics,	430
Infidelity a disease of the heart rather than of the understanding,	432
Unitarianism often resorted to, from a wish to escape from the strictness of Christianity,	433
Deists and Unitarians have possessed a great advantage in contending with the orthodox Christians, from being the assailants; practical hints which this suggests,	434
Half unbelievers; their system peculiarly irrational and criminal,	435
Increasing evidence of the truth of Christianity,	435
Unbelievers must stand the issue,	438

SECT. IV.—Advice suggested by the state of the times to true Christians.

Real Christians peculiarly bound to exert themselves in the present times,	439
Bound in particular to be earnest in prayer for their country,	441
Avowal of the Author, That in the decline of Religion he chiefly ascribes our National misfortunes, and that his best hopes are grounded on the persuasion, that we have among us many real Christians,	442
Motives which have powerfully prompted the Author to the prosecution of the present work,	443

INTRODUCTION.

It has been, for several years, the earnest wish of the writer of the following pages, to address his countrymen on the important subject of religion ; but the various duties of his public station, and a constitution incapable of much labour, have obstructed the execution of his purpose. Long has he been looking forward to some vacant season, in which he might devote his whole time and attention to this interesting service, free from the interruption of all other concerns ; and he has the rather wished for this opportunity of undistracted reflection, from a desire that what he might send into the world might thus be rendered less undeserving of the public eye. Meanwhile life is wearing away, and he daily becomes more and more convinced, that he might wait in vain for this season of complete vacancy. He must be content, therefore, to improve such occasional intervals of leisure as may occur to him in the course of an active and busy life, and to throw himself on the reader's indulgence for the pardon of such imperfections as the opportunity of undiverted attention and maturer reflection might have enabled him to discover and correct.

But the plea here suggested is by no means intended as an excuse for the opinions which he shall express, if they be found mistaken. Here, if he be in an error, he freely acknowledges it to be a deliberate error. He would indeed account himself unpardonable, were he to obtrude upon the public his first crude thoughts on a subject of such vast importance; and he can truly declare, that what he shall offer is the result of close observation, serious inquiry, much reading, and long and repeated consideration.

It is not improbable that he may be accused of deviating from his proper line, and of impertinently interfering in the concerns of a profession to which he does not belong. If it were necessary, however, to defend himself against this charge, he might shelter himself under the authority of many most respectable examples. But to such an accusation surely it may be sufficient to reply, that it is the duty of every man to promote the happiness of his fellow-creatures to the utmost of his power; and that he who thinks he sees many around him, whom he esteems and loves, labouring under a fatal error, must have a cold heart, or a most confined notion of benevolence, if he could withhold his endeavours to set them right, from an apprehension of incurring the imputation of officiousness.

But he might also allege, as a full justification, not only that religion is the business of every one, but that its advancement or decline in any country is so intimately connected with the temporal interests of society as to render it the peculiar concern of a political man; and that what he may presume to offer on the subject of religion may perhaps be perused with less jealousy and more candour, from the very circumstance of its having been written by a Layman, which must at least exclude the idea, (an idea sometimes illiberally suggested to take off the effect of the works of ecclesiastics,) that it is prompted by motives of self-interest, or of professional prejudice.

But if the writer's apology should not be found in the work itself, and in his avowed motive for undertaking it, in vain would he endeavour to satisfy his readers by any excuses: he will therefore proceed, without further preamble, to lay before them a general statement of his design.

The main object which he has in view is, not to convince the sceptic, or to answer the arguments of persons who avowedly oppose the fundamental doctrines of our religion; but to point out the scanty and erroneous system of the bulk of those who belong to the class of orthodox Christians, and to contrast their defective scheme with a representation of what the author apprehends to be real Christianity. Often has it filled him with deep concern to observe, in this description of persons, scarcely any distinct knowledge of the real nature and principles of the religion which they profess. The subject is of infinite importance; let it not be driven out of our minds by the bustle or dissipation of life. This present scene, with all its cares and all its gayeties, will soon be rolled away, and "we must stand before the judgment-seat of Christ." This awful consideration will prompt the writer to express himself with greater freedom than he should otherwise be disposed to use. And he trusts that this consideration, while it justifies its frankness, will secure to him a serious and patient perusal.

But it would be trespassing on the indulgence of the reader to detain him with introductory remarks. Let it only be further premised, that if what shall be stated should to any appear needlessly austere and rigid, the writer must lay in his claim not to be condemned without a fair inquiry, whether his statements do or do not accord with the language of the sacred writings. To that test he refers with confidence. And it must be conceded, by those who admit the authority of Scripture, that from the decision of the word of God there can be no appeal.

A PRACTICAL VIEW, &c.

CHAPTER I.

INADEQUATE CONCEPTIONS OF THE IMPORTANCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

Popular Notions.—Scripture Account.—Ignorance in this case criminal.—Two false Maxims exposed.

BEFORE we proceed to the consideration of any particular defects in the religious system of the bulk of professed Christians, it may be proper to point out the very inadequate conception which they entertain of the importance of Christianity in general, of its peculiar nature and superior excellence. If we listen to their conversation, virtue is praised, and vice is censured: piety is, perhaps, applauded, and profaneness condemned. So far all is well: but let any one, who would not be deceived by these “barren generalities,” examine a little more closely, and he will find, that not to Christianity in particular, but at best to Religion in general, perhaps to mere Morality, their homage is intended to be paid. With Christianity, as distinct from these, they are little acquainted; their views of it have been so cursory and superficial, that, far from discerning its peculiar characteristics, they have little more than perceived those exterior circumstances which distinguish it from other forms of Religion. There are some few facts, and perhaps some leading doctrines and principles, of which they cannot be wholly ignorant; but of the consequences, and relations, and practical uses of these they have few ideas, or none at all.

Does this language seem too strong in speaking of professed Christians—view then their plan of life, and their ordinary conduct; and let us ask, wherein can we discern the points of discrimination between them and acknowledged unbelievers? In an age wherein it is confessed and lamented that infidelity abounds, do we observe in them any remarkable care to instruct their children in the principles of the faith which they profess, and to furnish them with arguments for the defence of it? They would blush, on their child's coming out into the world, to think him defective in the branch of that knowledge, or of those accomplishments, which belong to his station in life: and accordingly these are cultivated with becoming assiduity. But he is left to collect his religion as he may: the study of Christianity has formed no part of his education; and his attachment to it, where any attachment to it exists at all, is too often not the preference of sober reason and conviction, but merely the result of early and groundless prepossession. He was born in a Christian country; of course he is a Christian: his father was a member of the church of England; so is he. When such is the religion handed down among us by hereditary succession, it cannot surprise us to observe young men of sense and spirit beginning to doubt altogether of the truth of the system in which they have been brought up, and ready to abandon a station which they are unable to defend. Knowing Christianity chiefly in the difficulties which it contains, and in the impossibilities which are falsely imputed to it, they fall, perhaps, into the company of infidels; where they are shaken by frivolous objections and profane cavils, which, had their religious persuasion been grounded in reason and argument, would have passed by them “as the idle wind.”

Let us beware before it be too late. No one can say into what discredit Christianity may hereby grow, at a time when the unrestrained intercourse, subsisting among the several ranks and classes of society, so much favours the general diffusion of the sentiments of the higher orders. To a similar ignorance may perhaps be ascribed, in no small degree, the success with which, in a neighbouring country, Christianity has of late years been attacked. Had she not been wholly unarmed for the contest—however she might have been forced from her untenable posts, and compelled to disembarass herself from her load of encumbrances—she never could have been driven altogether out of the field by her puny assailants, with all their cavils and gibes and sarcasms; for in these consisted the main strength of their petty artillery. Let us beware, lest we also suffer from a like cause; nor let it be our crime and our reproach, that in schools, perhaps even in colleges, Christianity is almost, if not altogether neglected.

It cannot be expected, that they who pay so little regard to this great object in the education of their children, should be more attentive to it in other parts of their conduct, where less strongly stimulated by affection, and less obviously loaded with responsibility. They are of course, therefore, little regardless of the state of Christianity in their own country; and still more indifferent about communicating the light of divine truth to the nations which "still sit in darkness."

But religion, it may be replied, is not noisy and ostentatious; it is modest and private in its nature; it resides in a man's own bosom, and shuns the observation of the multitude. Be it so.

From the transient and distant view, then, which we have been taking of these unassuming Christians, let us approach a little nearer, and listen to the unreserved conversation of their confidential hours. Here, if anywhere, the interior of the heart is laid open, and we may ascertain the true principles of their regards and aversions; the scale by which they measure the good and evil of life. Here, however, you will discover few or no traces of Christianity. She scarcely finds herself a place amidst the many objects of their hopes and fears and joys and sorrows. Grateful perhaps, as well indeed they may be grateful, for health and talents and affluence and other temporal possessions, they scarcely reckon in the number of their blessings this grand distinguishing mark of the bounty of Providence. Or, if they mention it at all, it is noticed coldly and formally, like one of those obsolete claims, to which, though but of small account in the estimate of our wealth or power, we think it as well to put in our title, from considerations of family decorum or of national usage.

But what more than all the rest establishes the point in question: let their conversation take a graver turn. Here at length their religion, modest and retired as we are now presuming it to be, must be expected to disclose itself. Here however you will look in vain for the religion of JESUS. Their standard of right and wrong is not the standard of the gospel: they approve and condemn by a different rule: they advance principles and maintain opinions altogether opposite to the genius and character of Christianity. You would fancy yourself rather among the followers of the old schools of philosophy: nor is it easy to guess how any one could satisfy himself to the contrary, unless, by mentioning the name of some acknowledged heretic, he should afford them an occasion of demonstrating their zeal for the religion of their country.

The truth is, their opinions on the subject of religion are not formed from the perusal of the word of God. The Bible lies on the shelf unopened: and they would be wholly ignorant of its contents, except for what they hear occasionally at church, or for the faint traces which their memories may still retain of the lessons of their earliest infancy.

How different, nay, in many respects how contradictory, would be the two systems of mere morals, of which the one should be formed from the commonly received maxims of the Christian world, and the other from the study of the Holy Scriptures! It would be curious to remark in any one, who had hitherto satisfied himself with the former, the astonishment which would be excited on his first introduction to the latter. We are not left here to bare conjecture. This was, in fact, the effect produced on the mind of a late ingenious writer,* of whose little work, though it bears some marks of his customary love of paradox, we must at least confess, that it exposes, in a strong point of view, the poverty of that superficial religion which prevails in our day; and that it throughout displays that happy perspicuity and grace which so eminently characterize the compositions of its author. But after this willing tribute of commendation, we are reluctantly compelled to remark, that the work in question discredits the cause which it was meant to serve, by many crude and extravagant positions; a defect from which no one can be secure who forms a hasty judgment of a deep and comprehensive subject, the several relations of which have been imperfectly surveyed; and above all, it must be lamented, that it treats the great question which it professes to discuss, rather as a matter of mere speculation than as one wherein our everlasting interests are involved. Surely the writer's object should have been, to convince his readers of their guilt still more than of their ignorance, and to leave them impressed rather with a sense of their danger than of their folly.

It were needless to multiply arguments in order to prove how criminal the voluntary ignorance of which we have been speaking must appear in the sight of God. It must be confessed by all who believe that we are accountable creatures, and to such only the writer is addressing himself, that we shall have to answer hereafter to the Almighty for all the means we have here enjoyed of improving ourselves, or of promoting the happiness of others. If, when summoned to give an account of our stewardship, we shall be called upon to answer for the use which we have made of our bodily organs, and of our means of relieving the wants of our fellow-creatures—how much more for the exercise of the nobler faculties of our nature, of invention, memory, and judgment, and for our employment of every instrument and opportunity of diligent application, and serious reflection, and honest decision! And to what subject might we in all reason be expected to apply more earnestly than to that wherein our own eternal interests are at issue? When God of his goodness hath vouchsafed to grant us such abundant means of instruction, in that which we are most concerned to know, how great must be the guilt, and how awful the punishment, of voluntary ignorance!

* It is almost superfluous to name Mr. Soame Jenyns.

And why are we in this pursuit alone to expect knowledge without inquiry, and success without endeavour? The whole analogy of nature inculcates a different lesson; and our own judgments, in matters of temporal interest and worldly policy, confirm the truth of her suggestions. Bountiful as is the hand of Providence, its gifts are not so bestowed as to seduce us into indolence, but to rouse us to exertion; and no one expects to attain to the height of learning, or arts, or power, or wealth, or military glory, without vigorous resolution, and strenuous diligence, and steady perseverance. Yet we expect to be Christians without labour, study, or inquiry! This is the more preposterous, because Christianity, being a revelation from God, and not the invention of man, discovering to us new relations, with their correspondent duties, containing also doctrines, motives, and precepts, peculiar to itself—we cannot reasonably expect to become proficient in it by the accidental intercourses of life, as one might learn insensibly the maxims of worldly policy, or a scheme of mere morals.

The diligent perusal of the Holy Scriptures would discover to us our past ignorance. We should cease to be deceived by superficial appearances, and to confound the gospel of Christ with the systems of philosophers. We should become impressed with the weighty truth, so much forgotten in the present day, that Christianity calls on us, as we value our immortal souls, not merely in general to be religious and moral, but specially to believe the doctrines, imbibe the principles, and practise the precepts of Christ. It might be to run into too great length to confirm this position beyond dispute by express quotations from the word of God. And, not to anticipate what belongs more properly to a subsequent part of the work, it may be sufficient here to remark in general, that Christianity is always represented in Scripture as the grand, the unparalleled instance of God's bounty to mankind. This unspeakable gift was graciously held forth in the original promise to our first parents; it was predicted by a long-continued series of prophets—the subject of their prayers, inquiries, and longing expectations. In a world which opposed and persecuted them, it was their source of peace and hope and consolation. At length it approached—the desire of all nations—the long-expected Star announced its presence—a multitude of the heavenly host hailed its introduction, and proclaimed its character: "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, goodwill towards men." The gospel is everywhere represented in Scripture by such figures as are most strongly calculated to impress on our minds a sense of its value. It is spoken of as light from darkness, as release from prison, as deliverance from captivity, as life from death. "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation!" was the exclamation with which it was welcomed by the pious Simeon; and it was universally received among the early converts with thankfulness and joy. At one time, the communication of it is promised as a reward; at another, the loss of it is threatened as a punishment. And, short as is the form of prayer taught us by our blessed Saviour, the more general extension of the kingdom of Christ constitutes one of its leading petitions.

With what exalted conceptions of the importance of Christianity ought we to be filled by such descriptions as these! Yet, in vain have we "line upon line, and precept upon precept."—Thus predicted, thus prayed and longed for, thus announced, characterized, and rejoiced in, this heavenly treasure, though poured into our lap in rich abundance, we scarcely accept. We turn from it coldly, or at best possess it negligently, as a thing of no estimation. But a due sense of its value would assuredly be impressed upon us by the diligent study of the word of God, that blessed repository of heavenly truth and consolation. Thence it is that we are to learn what we ought to believe and what to practise. And surely one would think that much importunity would not be requisite to induce men to a perusal of the sacred volume. Reason dictates, Revelation commands—"Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God,"—"Search the Scriptures,"—"Be ready to give to every one a reason of the hope that is in you." Such are the declarations and injunctions of the inspired writers; injunctions confirmed by commendations of those who obey the admonition. Yet is it not undeniable, that with the Bible in our houses, we are ignorant of its contents; and that hence, in a great measure, it arises, that the bulk of the Christian world know so little, and mistake so greatly, in what regards the religion which they profess?

This is not the place for enquiring at large whence it is that those who assent to the position, that the Bible is the word of God, and who profess to rest their hopes on the Christian basis, contentedly acquiesce in a state of such lamentable ignorance. But it may not be improper here to touch on two kindred opinions—from which, in the minds of the more thoughtful and serious, this acquiescence appears to derive much secret support. The one is, that it signifies little what a man believes; look to his practice. The other (of the same family) that sincerity is all in all. Let a man's opinions and conduct be what they may, yet, provided he be sincerely convinced that they are right, however the exigencies of civil society may require him to be dealt with among men, in the sight of God he cannot be criminal.

It would detain us too long fully to set forth the various evils inherent in these favourite positions, of which it is surely not the least, that they are of unbounded application, comprehending within their capacious limits most of the errors which have been received, and many of the most desperate crimes which have been perpetrated among men. Of the former of these maxims we may remark, that it proceeds on the monstrous supposition already noticed, that although accountable creatures, we shall not be called to account for the exercise of our intellectual and mental powers. Moreover, it is founded on that grossly fallacious assumption, that a man's opinions will not influence his practice. The advocates of this fashionable principle require to be reminded, that the judgment often receives a corrupt bias from the heart and the affections: that vice is the fruitful mother of prejudice and error. Forgetful of these acknowledged truths, and confounding the most important moral distinctions, they place on the same level those who, carefully weeding from their hearts every false principle, occupy themselves in a sincere and warm pursuit of truth, and those who yield themselves implicitly to the opinions, whatever they may be, which early prepossession may have infused, or which passion or interest, or even acquiescing indolence, may have imposed upon their minds.

The latter of the foregoing maxims, that sincerity is all in all, proceeds on this groundless supposition, that the Supreme Being has not afforded us sufficient means of discriminating truth from falsehood, right from wrong; and it implies that, be a man's opinions or conduct ever so wild and extravagant, we are to presume that they are as much the result of impartial inquiry and honest conviction as if his sentiments and actions had been strictly conformable to the rules of reason and sobriety. Never indeed was there a principle more general in its use, more sovereign in its potency. How does its beautiful simplicity also, and compendious brevity, give it rank before the laborious subtleties of Bellarmin! Clement, and Ravallac, and other worthies of a similar stamp, from whose purity of intention the world has hitherto withheld its due tribute of applause, would here have found a ready plea; and their injured innocence should now at length receive its full though tardy vindication. "These, however," it may be replied, "are excepted cases." Certainly they are cases of which any one who maintains the opinion in question would be glad to disencumber himself, because they clearly expose the unsoundness of his principle. But it will be encumbent on such a one first to explain with precision why they are to be exempted from its operation; and this he will find an impossible task; for sincerity, in its popular sense, cannot be made the criterion of guilt and innocence on any ground which will not equally serve to justify the assassins who have been instanced. The conclusion cannot be eluded: no man was ever more fully persuaded of the innocence of any action than those men were convinced that the horrid deed they were about to perpetrate was not merely lawful but highly meritorious. Thus Clement and Ravallac being unquestionably sincere, they were therefore indubitably innocent. Nay, the absurd and pernicious tendency of this principle might be shown to be even greater than what has yet been stated. It would scarcely be going too far to assert, that whilst it scorns the defence of petty villains, who still retain the sense of good and evil, it holds forth, like some well-frequented sanctuary, a secure asylum to more finished criminals, who, from long habits of wickedness, are lost to the perception no less than to the practice of virtue; and that it selects a seared conscience, and a callous heart, and a mind insensible to all moral distinctions, as the special objects of its vindication. Nor is it only in profane history that instances are to be found like those which we have mentioned, of persons committing the greatest crimes with a sincere conviction of the rectitude of their conduct. Scripture will afford us parallels: and it was surely to guard us against the very error which we have been now exposing that our blessed Saviour forewarned his disciples—"The time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service."

A principle like this must then be abandoned, and the advocates for sincerity must be compelled to restore this absurd term to its genuine signification; and to acknowledge, that it must imply honesty of mind, a faithful use of the means of knowledge and improvement, a desire of being instructed, humble inquiry, impartial consideration, and unprejudiced judgment. It is to these we would earnestly call you; and to such dispositions of mind, ever to be accompanied with fervent prayer for the divine blessing, Scripture everywhere holds forth the most animating promises. "Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.—Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters." Such are the comfortable assurances, such the gracious encouragements, held out to the truly sincere inquirer. How deep will be our guilt if we slight all these benevolent offers ! “ How many prophets and kings have desired to hear the things that we hear, and have not heard them ! ” Great indeed are our opportunities, great also is our responsibility. Let us awake to a true sense of our situation. Every consideration is presented to us that can alarm our fears or animate our industry. How soon may the brightness of our meridian sun be darkened ! Or, should the long-suffering of God still continue to us the mercies which we so much abuse, this will only aggravate our crime, and in the end enhance our punishment. The time of reckoning will at length arrive. And when finally summoned to the bar of God, to give an account of our stewardship, what plea can we have to urge in our defence, if we remain willingly and obstinately ignorant of the way which leads to life, with such transcendent means of knowing it, and such urgent motives to its pursuit ?

CHAPTER II.

CORRUPTION OF HUMAN NATURE.

SECT. I.

Inadequate conceptions of the Corruption of Human Nature.

AFTER considering the defective notions of the importance of Christianity in general which prevail among the higher orders of professed Christians, the particular misconceptions which first come under our notice respect the corruption and weakness of human nature. This is a topic on which it is possible that many into whose hands the present work shall fall may not have bestowed much attention. If the case be so, it may be requisite to entreat them to lend a patient and a serious ear. The subject is of the deepest import. Nor are we afraid of going too far when we assert that it lies at the very root of all true religion, and is eminently the basis and groundwork of Christianity.

So far as the writer has had an opportunity of remarking, the generality of professed Christians among the higher classes, either altogether overlook or deny, or at least greatly extenuate, the corruption and weakness here in question. They acknowledge indeed that there is, and ever has been in the world, a great portion of vice and wickedness—that mankind have been ever prone to sensuality and selfishness, in disobedience to the more refined and liberal principles of their nature,—that in all ages and countries, in public and in private life, innumerable instances have been afforded of oppression, of rapacity, of cruelty, of fraud, of envy, and of malice. They own that it is too often in vain that you inform the understanding, and convince the judgment. They admit that you do not thereby reform the hearts of men. Though they know their duty, they will not practise it—no, not even when you have forced them to acknowledge that the path of virtue is also that of real interest, and of solid enjoyment.

These facts are certain ; they cannot be disputed ; and they are at the same time so obvious, that one would have thought the celebrated apophthegm of the Grecian sage, "The majority are wicked," would scarcely have established his claim to intellectual superiority.

But though these defects of human depravity are everywhere acknowledged and lamented, we must not expect to find them traced to their true origin.

Causa latet, vis est notissima.

Prepare yourself to hear rather of frailty and infirmity, of petty transgressions, of occasional failings, of sudden surprisals, and of such other qualifying terms as may serve to keep out of view the true source of the evil, and, without shocking the understanding, may administer consolation to the pride of human nature. The bulk of professed Christians are used to speak of man as of a being who, naturally pure and inclined to all virtue, is sometimes, almost involuntarily, drawn out of the right course, or is overpowered by the violence of temptation. Vice with them is rather an accidental and temporary than a constitutional and habitual distemper—a noxious plant, which, though found to live and even to thrive in the human mind, is not the natural growth and production of the soil.

Far different is the humiliating language of Christianity. From it we learn that man is an apostate creature, fallen from his high original, degraded in his nature, and depraved in his faculties; indisposed to good, and disposed to evil; prone to vice—it is natural and easy to him; disinclined to virtue—it is difficult and laborious; he is tainted with sin, not slightly and superficially, but radically, and to the very core. That such is the Scripture account of man, however mortifying the acknowledgment of it may be to our pride, one would think, if this very corruption itself did not warp the judgment, none would be hardy enough to attempt to controvert. I know nothing which brings home so forcibly to my own feelings the truth of this representation as the consideration of what still remains to us of our primitive dignity, when contrasted with our present state of moral degradation—

“ Into what depth thou seest,
From what height fallen.”

Examine first with attention the natural powers and faculties of man—invention, reason, judgment, memory; a mind of “large discourse,” “looking before and after,” reviewing the past, thence determining for the present, and anticipating the future; discerning, collecting, combining, comparing; capable, not merely of apprehending, but of admiring, the beauty of moral excellence; with fear and hope to warm and animate; with joy and sorrow to solace and soften; with love to attach, with sympathy to harmonize, with courage to attempt, with patience to endure, and with the power of conscience, that faithful monitor within the breast, to enforce the conclusions of reason, and direct and regulate the passions of the soul. Truly we must pronounce him “majestic, though in ruin.” “Happy, happy world!” would be the exclamation of the inhabitant of some other planet, on being told of a globe like ours, peopled with such creatures as these, and abounding with situations and occasions to call forth the multiplied excellencies of their nature.—“Happy, happy world! with what delight must your great Creator and Governor witness your conduct, and what a glorious recompence awaits you when your term of probation shall have expired!”

“I bone, quo virtus tua te vocat: i pede fausto, Grandia laturus meritorum præmia.”

But we have indulged too long in these delightful speculations. A sad reverse presents itself on our survey of the actual state of man—when, from viewing his natural powers, we follow him into practice, and see the uses to which he applies them. Take in the whole of the prospect—view him in every age, and climate, and nation, in every condition and period of society. Where now do you discover the characters of his exalted nature? “How is the gold become dim, and the fine gold changed!” How is his reason clouded, his affections perverted, his conscience stupified! How do anger and envy and hatred and revenge spring up in his wretched bosom! How is he a slave to the meanest of his appetites! What fatal propensities does he discover to evil! What inaptitude to good!

Dwell awhile on the state of the ancient world; not merely on that benighted part of it where all lay buried in brutish ignorance and barbarism, but on the seats of civilized and polished nations—on the empire of taste and learning and philosophy; yet in these chosen regions, with whatever lustre the sun of science poured forth its rays, the moral darkness was so thick “that it might be felt.” Behold their sottish idolatries, their absurd superstitions, their want of natural affection, their brutal excesses, their unfeeling oppression, their savage cruelty! Look not to the illiterate and the vulgar, but to the learned and refined. Form not your ideas from the conduct of the less restrained and more licentious; you will turn away with disgust and shame from the allowed and familiar habits of the decent and the moral. St. Paul best states the facts, and furnishes the explanation: "Because they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, he gave them over to a reprobate mind."*

Now direct your view to another quarter, to the inhabitants of a new hemisphere, where the baneful practices and contagious example of the old world had never traveled. Surely, among these children of nature we may expect to find those virtuous tendencies for which we have hitherto looked in vain! Alas! our search will still be fruitless! They are

* Exempla duo, quæ pravitatis humanæ vim animo meo luculentur exhibent, non proferre non possum. Alterum, decens ille Virgilius, alterum Cicero, probus idem verique studiosus, suppeditat. Virgilius, innocuam certe pastorum vitam depicturas, ita incipit,

"Formosum pastor Corydon ardebat Alexim."

Cicero in libro de Officiis primo, ubi de actionibus prout inter se apte et convenientes sint, loci temporis, et agentis ratione habita, disserit, argumentum sic illustrat: "Turpe est enim, valdeque vitiosum, in re severa, convivio dignum, aut delicatum, aliquem inferre sermonem. Bene Pericles, quum haberet collegam in prætura Sophoclem poetam, lique de communi officio convenissent, et casu formosus puer præteriret, dixissetque Sophocles, O puerum pulchrum, Pericle! At enim, inquit Pericles, prætorem Sophoclem decet non solum manus, sed etiam oculos abstinentes habere. Atqui hoc idem Sophocles, si in athletarum probatione dixisset, justa reprehensione caruisset, tanta vis est, et loci et tempores." represented by the historian of America, whose account is more favourable than those of some other great authorities, as being a compound of pride, indolence, selfishness, cunning, and cruelty;* full of a revenge which nothing could satiate, of a ferocity which nothing could soften; strangers to the most amiable sensibilities of nature.† They appeared incapable of conjugal affection, or parental fondness, or filial reverence, or social attachments; uniting too with their state of barbarism many of the vices and weaknesses of polished society. Their horrid treatment of captives taken in war, on whose bodies they feasted, after putting them to death by the most cruel tortures, is so well known, that we may spare the disgusting recital. No commendable qualities relieve this gloomy picture, except fortitude and perseverance and zeal for the welfare of their little community—if this last quality, exercised and directed as it was, can be thought deserving of commendation.

Quomodo sese res habuisse necesse est, cum vir antiquorum præstantissimis adscribendus, philosophiam, immo mores et officia tractans, talia doceret! Qualem sibi ipse virtutis normam proposuerat, satis liquet. Vide inter alia, justa reprehensione, etc., et tanta vis est, etc.

But you give up the heathen nation as indefensible, and wish rather to form your estimate of man from a view of countries which have been blessed with the light of Revelation.—True it is, and with joy let us record the concession, Christianity has set the general tone of morals much higher than it was ever found in the Pagan world. She has everywhere improved the character of man, and multiplied the comforts of society, particularly to the poor and the weak, whom from the beginning she professed to take under her special patronage. Like her divine

* Robertson, vol. ii, p. 130.

† Ibid., Book iv, Sect. 2. Head, Condition of Women, vol. ii, 8vo, pp. 90, 91.

Author, “who sends his rain on the evil and on the good,” she showers down unnumbered blessings on thousands who profit from her bounty, while they forget or deny her power, and set at nought her authority. Yet even in this more favoured situation, we shall discover too many lamentable proofs of the depravity of man. Nay, this depravity will now become even more apparent and less excusable. For what bars does it not now overleap? Over what motives is it not now victorious? Consider well the superior light and advantages which we enjoy, and then appreciate the superior obligations which are imposed on us. Consider in how many cases our evil propensities are now kept from breaking forth, by the superior restraints under which vice is laid among us by positive laws, and by the amended standard of public opinion; and we may be assisted in conjecturing what force is to be assigned to these motives, by the dreadful proofs which have been lately exhibited in a neighbouring country, that when their influence is withdrawn, the most atrocious crimes can be perpetrated shamelessly, and in the face of day. Consider then the superior excellence of our moral code, the new principles of obedience furnished by the gospel, and, above all, the awful sanction which the doctrines and precepts of Christianity derive from the clear discovery of a future state of retribution, and from the annunciation of that tremendous day, “when we shall stand before the judgment-seat of Christ.” Yet, in spite of all our knowledge, thus enforced and pressed home by so solemn a notice, how little has been our progress in virtue! It has been by no means such as to prevent the adoption, in our days, of various maxims of antiquity, which, when well considered, too clearly establish the depravity of man. It may not be amiss to adduce a few instances in proof of this assertion. It is now no less acknowledged than heretofore, that prosperity hardens the heart; that unlimited power is ever abused, instead of being rendered the instrument of diffusing happiness; that habits of vice grow up of themselves, whilst those of virtue are of slow and difficult formation; that they who draw the finest pictures of virtue, and seem most enamoured of her charms, are often the least under her influence, and by the merest trifles are drawn aside from that line of conduct which they most seriously recommend to others; that all this takes place, though most of the pleasures of vice are to be found with less alloy in the paths of virtue; whilst, at the same time, these paths afford superior and more exquisite delights, peculiar to themselves, and are free from the diseases and bitter remorse, at the price of which vicious gratifications are so often purchased.

It may suffice to touch very slightly on some other arguments, which it would hardly be right to leave altogether unnoticed. One of these, the justice of which, however denied by superficial moralists, parents of strict principles can abundantly testify, may be drawn from the perverse and froward dispositions perceivable in children, the correction of which too often baffles the most strenuous efforts of the wise and good. Another may be drawn from the various deceits we are apt to practise on ourselves, to which no one can be a stranger who has ever contemplated the operations of his own mind with serious attention.

To the influence of this species of corruption it has been in a great degree owing, that Christianity itself has been too often disgraced. The gospel of peace has been turned into an engine of cruelty, and, amidst the bitterness of persecution, every trace has disappeared of the mild and beneficent spirit of the religion of Jesus. In what degree must the taint have wrought itself into the frame, and corrupted the habit, when the most wholesome nutriment can be thus converted into the deadliest poison ! Wishing always to argue from such premises as are not only really sound, but from such as cannot even be questioned by those to whom this work is addressed, little was said in representing the deplorable state of the heathen world respecting their defective and unworthy conceptions in what regards the Supreme Being, who even then “left not himself without witness, but gave them rain and fruitful seasons, filling their hearts with food and gladness.” But surely to any who call themselves Christians, it may be justly urged, as an astonishing instance of human depravity, that we ourselves, who enjoy the full light of Revelation—to whom God has vouchsafed such clear discoveries of what we are concerned to know of his being and attributes—who profess to believe that “in him we live and move and have our being”—that to him we owe all the comforts we here enjoy, and the offer of eternal glory, purchased for us by the atoning blood of his own Son,—“thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift,”—that we, thus loaded with mercies, should be continually chargeable with forgetting his authority, and being ungrateful for his benefits—with slighting his gracious proposals, or, at best, receiving them with cold and unaffected hearts.

But to put the question concerning the natural depravity of man to the severest test; take the best of the human species, the watchful, self-denying Christian, and let him decide the controversy; not by inferences drawn from the practices of a thoughtless and dissolute world, but by an appeal to his personal experience. Go with him into his closet; ask him his opinion of the corruption of the heart; and he will tell you that he is deeply sensible of its power, for that he has learned it from much self-observation and long acquaintance with the workings of his own mind. He will tell you that every day strengthens this conviction; yea, that hourly he sees fresh reason to deplore his want of simplicity in intention, his infirmity of purpose, his low views, his selfish unworthy desires, his backwardness to set about his duty, his languor and coldness in performing it—that he finds himself obliged continually to confess, that he feels within him two opposite principles, and that “he cannot do the things that he would.” He cries out in the language of the excellent Hooker—“The little fruit which we have in holiness, it is, God knoweth, corrupt and unsound: we put no confidence at all in it, we challenge nothing in the world for it, we dare not call God to reckoning, as if we had him in our debt-books; our continual suit to him is, and must be, to bear with our infirmities, and pardon our offences.”

Such is the moral history, such the condition of man. The figures of the piece may vary, and the colouring may sometimes be of a darker, sometimes of a lighter hue: but the principles of the composition—the grand outlines, are everywhere the same.

Wherever we direct our view, we discover the melancholy proofs of our depravity; whether we look to ancient or modern times, to barbarous or civilized nations, to the conduct of the world around us, or to the monitor within the breast; whether we read or hear or act or think or feel, the same humiliating lesson is forced upon us, Jupiter est quodcunque vides, quocunque moveris.

Now, when we look back to the picture which was formerly drawn of the natural powers of man, and compare this his actual state with that for which, from a consideration of those powers, he seems to have been originally designed, how are we to account for the astonishing contrast? Will frailty or infirmity, or occasional lapses, or sudden surprisals, or any such qualifying terms, convey an adequate idea of the nature of the distemper, or point out its cause? How, on any principles of common reasoning, can we account for it, but by conceiving that man, since he came out of the hands of his Creator, has contracted a taint, and that the venom of this subtle poison has been communicated throughout the race of Adam, everywhere exhibiting incontestable marks of its fatal malignity? Hence it has arisen, that the appetites deriving new strength, and the powers of reason and conscience being weakened, the latter have feebly and impotently pleaded against those forbidden indulgences which the former have solicited. Sensual gratifications and illicit affections have debased our nobler powers, and indisposed our hearts to the discovery of God and to the consideration of his perfections—to a constant willing submission to his authority, and obedience to his laws. By a repetition of vicious acts, evil habits have been formed within us, and have riveted the fetters of sin. Left to the consequences of our own folly, the understanding has grown darker, and the heart more obdurate: reason has at length betrayed her trust, and even conscience herself has aided the delusion, till, instead of deploring our miserable condition, we have too often hugged our chains, and even gloried in our ignominious bondage.

Such is the general account of the progress of vice where it is suffered to attain to its full growth in the human heart. The circumstances of individuals indeed will be found to differ: to continue a figure so exactly descriptive of the case, the servitude of some is more rigorous than that of others, their bonds more galling, their degradation more complete. Some, too, have for a while appeared almost to have escaped from their confinement; but none are altogether free: all, without exception, in a greater or less degree, bear about them, more visibly or more concealed, the disgraceful marks of their captivity.

Such, on a full and fair investigation, must be confessed to be the state of facts; and how can this be accounted for on any other supposition than that of some original taint—some radical principle of corruption? All other solutions are unsatisfactory—whilst the potent cause which has been assigned does abundantly, and can alone sufficiently, account for the effect. It appears then, that the corruption of human nature is proved by the same mode of reasoning as that which hath been deemed conclusive in establishing the existence of the principle of gravitation, and in ascertaining its laws; that the doctrine rests on that solid basis on which Newton hath raised the superstructure of his sublime philosophy; that it is not a mere speculation—an uncertain, though perhaps an ingenious theory; but the sure result of large and actual experiment, deduced from incontestable facts, and still more fully approving its truth by harmonizing with the several parts, and accounting for the various phenomena, jarring otherwise, and inexplicable, of the great system of the universe.

Here, however, Revelation interposes, and sustains the fallible conjectures of our unassisted reason. The Holy Scriptures speak of us as fallen creatures; in almost every page we shall find something that is calculated to abate the loftiness, and silence the pretensions of man. “The imagination of man’s heart is evil from his youth.” “What is man, that he should be clean? and he which is born of a woman, that he should be righteous?” “How much more abominable and filthy is man, who drinketh iniquity like water!” “The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, and seek God. They are all gone aside: they are altogether become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no, not one.” “Who can say, I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin?” “The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it?” “Behold, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me.” “We were by nature the children of wrath, even as others, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind.” “O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death!”

Passages might be multiplied upon passages, which speak the same language, and these again might be illustrated and confirmed by various other considerations, drawn from the same sacred source; such as those which represent a thorough change, a renovation of our nature, as being necessary to our becoming true Christians; or which are suggested by observing that holy men refer their good dispositions and affections to the immediate agency of the Supreme Being.

SECT. II.

Evil Spirit.—Natural State of Man.

But the word of God instructs us that we have to contend not only with our own natural depravity, but with the power of darkness, the Evil Spirit, who rules in the hearts of the wicked, and whose dominion we learn from Scripture to be so general as to entitle him to the denomination of the “Prince of this world.” There cannot be a stronger proof of the difference which exists between the religious system of the Scriptures, and that of the bulk of nominal Christians, than the proof which is afforded by the subject now in question. The existence and agency of the Evil Spirit, though so distinctly and repeatedly affirmed in Scripture, are almost universally exploded in a country which professes to admit the authority of the sacred volume. Some other doctrines of Revelation, the force and meaning of which are commonly in a great degree explained away, are yet conceded in general terms. But this seems almost on the point of being universally abandoned as a post no longer tenable. It is regarded as an evanescent prejudice which it would now be a discredit to any man of understanding to believe. Like ghosts and witches and other phantoms, which haunted the night of superstition, it cannot in these more enlightened times stand the test of our severer scrutiny. To be suffered to pass away quietly is as much as it can hope for; and it might rather expect to be laughed off the stage as a just object of contempt and derision.

But, although the Scripture doctrine concerning the Evil Spirit is thus generally exploded, yet, were we to consider the matter seriously and fairly, we should probably find ground for believing that there is no better reason for its being abandoned than that many absurd stories, concerning spirits and apparitions, have been commonly propagated amongst weak and credulous people; and that the Evil Spirit not being the object of our bodily eyes, it would argue the same weakness to give credit to the doctrine of its existence and agency. But to be consistent with ourselves, we might almost as well, on the same principle, deny the reality of all other incorporeal beings. What is there, in truth, in the doctrine, which is in itself improbable, or which is not confirmed by analogy? We see, in fact, that there are wicked men, enemies to God, and malignant towards their fellow-creatures, who take pleasure, and often succeed, in seducing others to the commission of evil. Why then should it be deemed incredible that there may be spiritual intelligences of similar propensities, who may, in like manner, be permitted to tempt men to the practice of sin? Surely we may retort upon our opponents the charge of absurdity, and justly accuse them of gross inconsistency, in admitting, without difficulty, the existence and operation of these qualities in a being like man, compounded of matter and spirit, and yet denying them in a purely spiritual being, in direct contradiction to the authority of Scripture, which they allow to be conclusive, when they cannot pretend for a moment that there is any thing belonging to the nature of matter to which these qualities naturally adhere.

But it is needless to dilate further on a topic which, however it may excite the ridicule of the inconsiderate, will suggest matter of serious apprehension to all who form their opinions on a sincere and impartial examination of the word of God. It fills up the measure of our natural misery and helplessness. Such then being our condition, thus depraved and weakened within, and tempted from without, it may well fill our hearts with anxiety to reflect, "that the day will come when the heavens, being on fire, shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat;" when "the dead, small and great, shall stand before the tribunal of God," and we shall have to give account of all things done in the body. We are naturally prompted to turn over the page of Revelation with solicitude, in order to discover the attributes and character of our Judge; but these only serve to turn painful apprehension into fixed and certain terror.

First, with regard to the attributes of our Judge. As all nature bears witness to his irresistible power, so we read in Scripture that nothing can escape his observation, or elude his discovery; not only our actions, but our most secret cogitations are open to his view. “He is about our path, and about our bed, and spieth out all our ways.” “The Lord searcheth all hearts, and understandeth all the imaginations of the thoughts.” “And he will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the heart.”

Now hear his character, and the rule of his award; “The Lord our God is a consuming fire, even a jealous God.”—“He is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity.”—“The soul that sinneth, it shall die.”—“The wages of sin is death.”—“Without holiness no man shall see the Lord.” These positive declarations are enforced by the accounts which, for our warning, we read in sacred history, of the terrible vengeance of the Almighty: His punishment of “the angels who kept not their first estate, and whom he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day;” The fate of Sodom and Gomorrah: The sentence issued against the idolatrous nations of Canaan, and of which the execution was assigned to the Israelites, by the express command of God, at their own peril in case of disobedience: The ruin of Babylon, of Tyre, of Nineveh, and of Jerusalem, prophetically denounced as the punishment of their crimes, and taking place in an exact and terrible accordance with the divine predictions. Surely these examples may suffice to confound that fallacious confidence, which, presuming on the Creator’s knowledge of our weakness, and his disposition to allow for it, should allege, that instead of giving way to gloomy apprehensions, we might throw ourselves, in full assurance of hope, on the infinite benevolence of the Supreme Being. It is true, indeed, that with the threatenings of the word of God, there are mixed many gracious declarations of pardon, on repentance and thorough amendment. But, alas! who is there among us whose conscience must not reproach him with having trifled with the long-suffering of God, and with having but ill kept the resolutions of amendment which had been formed in the seasons of recollection and remorse?—And how is the disquietude naturally excited by such a retrospect confirmed and heightened by passages like these! “Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; but ye have set at nought all my counsel, and would none of my reproof: I also will laugh at your calamity, I will mock when your fear cometh; when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you. Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me: for that they hated knowledge, and did not choose the fear of the Lord.” The apprehensions, which must be excited by thus reading the recorded judgments and awful language of Scripture, are confirmed to the inquisitive and attentive mind by a close observation of the moral constitution of the world. In fact, all that has been suggested of the final consequences of vice is strictly analogous to what we may observe in the ordinary course of human affairs; from a careful survey of which it will appear, that God hath established such an order of causes and effects, as however interrupted here below, by hinderances and obstructions apparently of a temporary nature, loudly proclaim the principles of his moral government, and strongly suggest that vice and imprudence will finally terminate in misery.* Not that this species of proof was wanted; for that which we must acknowledge, on weighing the evidence, to be a revelation from God, requires not the aid of such a confirmation: but yet, as this accordance might be expected between the words and the works of the same Almighty Being, it is no idle speculation to remark, that the visible constitution of things in the world around us falls in with the scriptural representations of the dreadful consequences of vice, nay, even of what is commonly termed inconsiderateness and imprudence.

If such then be indeed our sad condition, what is to be done? Is there no hope? Nothing left for us “but a fearful looking-for of judgment, and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries?” Blessed be God! we are not shut up irrecoverably in this sad condition: “Turn you to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope:” hear one who proclaims his designation, “to heal the broken-hearted, to preach liberty to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind.” They who have formed a true notion of their lost and helpless state, will most gladly listen to the sound, and most justly estimate the value, of such a deliverance. And hence appears the importance of not passing over in a cursory manner, those important topics of the original and superinduced corruption and weakness of man—a discussion painful and humiliating to the pride of human nature, to which the mind listens with difficulty, nay, with a mixture of anger and disgust; but well suited to our case, and like the distasteful lessons of adversity, permanently useful in its consequences.

* See Butler’s Analogy.

It is here, never let it be forgotten, that our foundation must be laid; otherwise our superstructure, whatever we may think of it, will one day prove tottering and insecure. This therefore is not a metaphysical speculation, but a practical matter. Slight and superficial conceptions of our state of natural degradation, and of our insufficiency to recover from it by our own unassisted powers, fall in too well with our natural inconsiderateness, and produce that fatal insensibility to the divine threatenings which we cannot but observe to prevail so generally. Having no due sense of the malignity of our disease, and of its dreadful issue, we do not set ourselves to work in earnest to obtain the remedy, and it can only be thus obtained; for let it be remembered, that deliverance is not forced on us, but offered to us; we are furnished indeed with every help, and are always to bear in mind that we are unable of ourselves to will or to do rightly, but we are plainly admonished to “work out our own salvation with fear and trembling;”—to be watchful, “because we are encompassed with dangers:”—to “put on the whole armour of God,” because “we are beset with enemies.”

May we be enabled to shake off that lethargy which is so apt to creep upon us! For this end, a deep practical conviction of our natural depravity and weakness will be found of eminent advantage. As it is by this we must at first be roused from our fallacious security, so by this we must be kept wakeful and active unto the end. Let us therefore make it our business to have this doctrine firmly seated in our understandings, and radically implanted in our hearts. With a view to our conviction of the truth of this doctrine, we should seriously and attentively consider the firm grounds on which it rests. It is plainly made known to us by the light of nature, and irresistibly enforced on us by the dictates of our unassisted understandings. But lest there should be any so obstinately dull as not to discern the force of the evidence suggested to our reason, and confirmed by all experience, or rather so heedless as not to notice it, the authoritative stamp of Revelation is superadded, as we have seen, to complete the proof; and we must therefore be altogether inexcusable if we still remain unconvinced by such an accumulated mass of argument.

But it is not sufficient to assent to the doctrine, we must also feel it. To this end, let the power of habit be called in to our aid. Let us accustom ourselves to refer to our natural depravity, as to their primary cause, the sad instances of vice and folly of which we read, or which we see around us, or to which we feel the propensities in our own bosoms; ever vigilant and distrustful of ourselves, and looking with an eye of kindness and pity on the faults and infirmities of others, whom we should learn to regard with the same tender concern as that with which the sick are used to sympathise with those who are suffering under the same distemper. This lesson once well acquired, we shall feel the benefit of it in all our future progress; and though it be a lesson which we are slow to learn, it is one in which study and experience, the incidents of every day, and every fresh observation of the workings of our own hearts, will gradually concur to perfect us. Let it not, after all, then, be our reproach, and at length our ruin, that these abundant means of instruction are possessed in vain.

SECT. III.

Corruption of Human Nature.—Objection.

But there is one difficulty still behind, more formidable than all the rest. The pride of man is loath to be humbled. Forced to abandon the plea of innocence, and pressed so closely that he can no longer escape from the conclusion to which we would drive him, some more bold objector faces about and stands at bay, endeavouring to justify what he cannot deny. “Whatever I am,” he contends, “I am what my Creator made me. I inherit a nature, you yourself confess, depraved, and prone to evil; how then can I withstand the temptations to sin by which I am environed? If this plea cannot establish my innocence, it must excuse or at least extenuate my guilt. Frail and weak as I am, a Being of infinite justice and goodness will never try me by a rule which, however equitable in the case of creatures of a higher nature, is altogether disproportionate to mine.”

Let not my readers be alarmed! The writer is not going to enter into the discussion of the grand question concerning the origin of moral evil, or to attempt to reconcile its existence and consequent punishment with the acknowledged attributes and perfections of God. These are questions of which if one may judge from the little success with which the acutest and profoundest reasoners have been ever labouring to solve the difficulties they contain, the full and clear comprehension is above the intellect of man. Yet, as the objection above mentioned is sometimes heard from the mouths of professed Christians, it must not be passed by without a few short observations.

Were the language in question to be addressed to us by an avowed sceptic, though it might not be very difficult to expose to him the futility of his reasonings, we should almost despair of satisfying him of the soundness of our own. We should perhaps suggest impossibilities, which might stand in the way of such a system as he would establish: arguing from concessions which he would freely make, we might indeed point out wherein his preconceptions concerning the conduct of the Supreme Being, had been in fact already contradicted, particularly by the undeniable existence of natural or moral evil: and if thus proved erroneous in one instance, why might they not be so likewise in another? But though by these and similar arguments we might at length silence our objector, we could not much expect to bring him over to our opinions. We should probably do better, if we were to endeavour rather to draw him off from those dark and slippery regions—slippery in truth they are to every human foot—and to contend with him where we might tread with firmness and freedom, on sure ground, and in the light of day. Then we might fairly lay before him all the various arguments for the truth of our holy religion—arguments which have been sufficient to satisfy the wisest and the best and the ablest of men. We might afterwards insist on the abundant confirmation Christianity receives from its being exactly suited to the nature and wants of man; and we might conclude with fairly putting it to him, whether all this weight of evidence were to be overbalanced by one difficulty, on a subject so confessedly high and mysterious, considering, too, that he must allow we see but a part (O, how small a part!) of the universal creation of God, and that our faculties are wholly incompetent to judge of the schemes of his infinite wisdom. This, if the writer may be permitted to offer his own judgment, is, at least in general, the best mode, in the case of the objection we are now considering, of dealing with unbelievers; and to adopt the contrary plan seems somewhat like that of any one who, having to convince some untutored Indian of the truth of the Copernican system, instead of beginning with plain and simple propositions, and leading him on to what is more abstruse and remote, should state to him at the outset some startling problems, to which the understanding can only yield its slow assent, when constrained by the decisive force of demonstration. The novice, instead of lending himself to such a mistaken method of instruction, would turn away in disgust, and be only hardened against his preceptor. But it must be remembered, that the present work is addressed to those who acknowledge the authority of the Holy Scriptures. And in order to convince all these that there is, somewhere or other, a fallacy in our objector's reasoning, it will be sufficient to establish, that, though the word of God clearly asserts the justice and goodness of the Supreme Being, and also the natural depravity of man, yet it no less clearly lays down, that this natural depravity shall never be admitted as an excuse for sin, but that “they which have done evil, shall rise to the resurrection of damnation,”—that “the wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the people that forget God.” And it is worthy of remark, that, as if for the very purpose of more effectually silencing those unbelieving doubts which are ever springing up in the human heart, our blessed Saviour, though the messenger of peace and goodwill to man, has again and again repeated these awful denunciations.

Nor are the Holy Scriptures less clear and full in guarding us against supposing our sins, or the dreadful consequences of them, to be chargeable on God.—“Let no man say, when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man:” “The Lord is not willing that any should perish.” And in other passages, where the idea is repelled as injurious to his character: “Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die, saith the Lord God; and not that he should return from his ways, and live?” “For I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God.” Indeed almost every page of the word of God contains some warning or invitation to sinners; and all these, to a considerate mind, must be unquestionable proofs of our present condition.

It has been the more necessary not to leave unnoticed the objection which we have been now refuting, because, where not admitted to such an unqualified extent as altogether to take away the moral responsibility of man, and when not avowed in the daring language in which it has been above stated, it may frequently be observed to exist in an inferior degree; and often, when not distinctly formed into shape, it lurks in secret, diffusing a general cloud of doubt or unbelief, or lowering our standard of right, or whispering fallacious comfort, and producing a ruinous tranquillity. It is of the utmost importance to remark, that though the Holy Scriptures so clearly state the natural corruption and weakness of man, yet they never, in the remotest degree, countenance, but throughout directly oppose, the supposition, to which we are often too forward to listen, that our natural corruption and weakness will be admitted as lowering the demands of divine justice, and, in some sort, palliating our transgressions of the laws of God. It would not be difficult to show, that such a notion is at war with the whole scheme of redemption by the atonement of Christ. But perhaps it may be enough, when any such suggestions as those which we are condemning force themselves into the imagination of a Christian, to recommend it to him to silence them by what is their best practical answer—that if our natural condition be depraved and weak, our temptations numerous, and our Almighty Judge infinitely holy, yet that the offers of pardon, grace, and strength to penitent sinners, are universal and unlimited. Let it not however surprise us, if in all this there seem to be involved difficulties which we cannot fully comprehend. How many such present themselves on all sides! Scarcely is there an object around us that does not afford endless matter of doubt and argument. The meanest reptile which crawls on the earth, nay, every herb and flower which we behold, baffles the imbecility of our limited inquiries. All nature calls upon us to be humble. Can it then be surprising if we are at a loss on this question, which respects not the properties of matter, or of numbers, but the councils and ways of Him whose understanding is infinite"—“whose judgments” are declared to be “unsearchable, and his ways past finding out?” In this our ignorance, however, we may calmly repose ourselves on his own declaration, “that though clouds and darkness are round about him, yet righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne.” Let it also be remembered, that if in Christianity some things are difficult, that which we are most concerned to know is plain and obvious. To this it is true wisdom to attach ourselves, assenting to what is revealed where it is above our comprehension, (we do not say contrary to our reason,) and believing it on the credit of what is clearly discerned and satisfactorily established. In truth, we are all perhaps too apt to plunge into depths which it is beyond our power to fathom; and it was to warn us against this very error that the inspired writer, having threatened the people whom God had selected as the objects of his special favour with the most dreadful punishments, if they should forsake the law of the Lord, and having introduced surrounding nations as asking the meaning of the severe infliction, winds up the whole with this instructive admonition: “Secret things belong unto the Lord our God: but those which are revealed belong unto us, and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this law.”

To any one who is seriously impressed with a sense of the critical state in which we are here placed—a short and uncertain space in which to make our peace with God, and this little span of life followed by the last judgment, and an eternity of unspeakable happiness or misery—it is indeed an awful and an affecting spectacle, to see men thus busying themselves in vain speculations of an arrogant curiosity, and trifling with their dearest, their everlasting interests. It is but a feeble illustration of this exquisite folly, to compare it to the conduct of some convicted rebel, who, when brought into the presence of his sovereign, instead of seizing the occasion to sue for mercy, should even treat with neglect and contempt the pardon which should be offered to him, and insolently employ himself in prying into his sovereign's designs, and criticising his counsels. But our case, too similar as it is to that of the convicted rebel, differs from it in this grand particular, that, at the best, his success must be uncertain, ours, if it be not our own fault, is sure; and while, on the one hand, our guilt is unspeakably greater than that of any rebel against an earthly monarch, so, on the other, we know that our Sovereign is “long-suffering, and easy to be entreated”—more ready to grant forgiveness than we to ask it. Well then may we adopt the language of the poet:

“What better can we do than prostrate fall
Before him reverent, and there confess Humbly our faults, and pardon beg, with tears
Watering the ground, and with our sighs the air Frequenting, sent from hearts contrite, in sign Of sorrow unfeign'd, and humiliation meek?”

MILTON.

CHAPTER III.

CHIEF DEFECTS OF THE RELIGIOUS SYSTEM OF THE BULK OF PROFESSED CHRISTIANS IN WHAT REGARDS OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, AND THE HOLY SPIRIT—WITH A DISSERTATION CONCERNING THE USE OF THE PASSIONS IN RELIGION.

SECT. I.

Inadequate conceptions concerning our Saviour and the Holy Spirit.

THAT “God so loved the world, as of his tender mercy to give his only Son Jesus Christ for our redemption:”

That our blessed Lord willingly left the glory of the Father, and was made man:

That “he was despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief:”

That “he was wounded for our transgressions; that he was bruised for our iniquities:”

That “the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all:

That at length “he humbled himself even to the death of the cross, for us miserable sinners, to the end that all who, with hearty repentance and true faith, should come to him, might not perish, but have everlasting life:”

That he “is now at the right hand of God, making intercession” for his people:

That “being reconciled to God by the death of his Son, we may come boldly unto the throne of grace, to obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need :”

That our heavenly Father “ will surely give his Holy Spirit to them that ask him :”

That “ the Spirit of God must dwell in us ;” and that “ if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his :”

That, by this divine influence, “ we are to be renewed in knowledge after the image of Him who created us,” and “ to be filled with the fruits of righteousness, to the praise of the glory of his grace ;” —that, “ being thus made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light,” we shall sleep in the Lord ; and that when the last trumpet shall sound, this corruption shall put on incorruption—and that, being at length perfected after his likeness, we shall be admitted into his heavenly kingdom.

These are the leading doctrines, concerning our Saviour and the Holy Spirit which are taught in the Holy Scriptures, and held by the Church of England. The truth of them, agreeably to our general plan, will be taken for granted. Few of those who have been used to join in the established form of worship can have been, it is hoped, so inattentive as to be ignorant of these grand truths, which are to be found everywhere dispersed throughout our excellent Liturgy. Would to God it could be presumed, with equal confidence, that all who assent to them in terms discern in the understanding their force and excellency, and feel their power in the affections, and their transforming influence in the heart ! What lively emotions are they calculated to excite in us of deep self-abasement and abhorrence of our sins, together with humble hope, and firm faith, and heavenly joy, and ardent love, and active unceasing gratitude !

But here, it is to be feared, will be found a grand defect in the religion of the bulk of professed Christians—a defect like the palsy at the heart, which, while in its first attack it changes but little the exterior appearance of the body, extinguishes the internal principle of heat and motion, and soon extends its benumbing influence to the remotest fibres of the frame. This defect is closely connected with that which was the chief subject of the last chapter : “ they that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick.” Had we duly felt the burden of our sins, accompanied with a deep conviction that the weight of them must finally sink us into perdition, our hearts would have danced at the sound of the gracious invitation, “ Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.” But in those who have scarcely felt their sins as any encumbrance, it would be mere affectation to pretend to very exalted conceptions of the value and acceptableness of the proffered deliverance. This pretence, accordingly, is seldom now kept up ; and the most superficial observer, comparing the sentiments and views of the bulk of the Christian world with the articles still retained in their creed, and with the strong language of Scripture, must be struck with the amazing disproportion.

To pass over the throng from whose minds religion is altogether excluded by the business or the vanities of life, how is it with the more decent and moral ? To what criterion shall we appeal ? Are their hearts really filled with these things, and warmed by the love which they are adapted to inspire? Then surely their minds are apt to stray to them almost unseasonably; or at least to hasten back to them with eagerness, when escaped from the estrangement imposed by the necessary cares and business of life. He was a masterly describer of human nature who thus portrayed the characters of an undissembled affection:

“Unstaid and fickle in all other things,
Save in the constant image of the object
That is beloved.”—SHAKESPEARE.

“And how,” it may be perhaps replied, “do you know but that the minds of these people are thus occupied? Can you look into the bosoms of men?” Let us appeal to a test to which we resorted in a former instance. “Out of the abundance of the heart,” it has been pronounced, “the mouth speaketh.” Take these persons then in some well selected hour, and lead the conversation to the subject of Religion. The utmost which can be effected is to bring them to talk of things in the gross. They appear lost in generalities; there is nothing precise and determinate, nothing which implies a mind used to the contemplation of its object. In vain you strive to bring them to speak on that topic which one might expect to be ever uppermost in the hearts of redeemed sinners. They elude all your endeavours; and if you make mention of it yourself, it is received with no very cordial welcome at least, if not with unequivocal disgust—it is, at the best, a forced and formal discussion. The excellence of our Saviour's moral precepts, the kindness, and simplicity, the self-denial and unblemished purity of his life, his patience and meekness in the hour of death, cannot indeed be spoken of but with admiration, when spoken of at all, as they have often extorted unwilling praise from the most daring and malignant infidels. But are not these mentioned as qualities in the abstract, rather than as the perfections and lineaments of our patron and benefactor and friend, "who loved us, and gave himself for us"—of Him "who died for our offences, and rose again for our justification"—"who is even now at the right hand of God, making intercession for us?" Who would think that the kindness, and humanity, and self-denial, and patience in suffering, which we so dryly commend, had been exerted towards ourselves, in acts of more than finite benevolence, of which we were to derive the benefit—in condescensions and labours submitted to for our sakes—in pain and ignominy endured for our deliverance?

But these grand truths are not suffered to vanish altogether from our remembrance. Thanks to the compilers of our Liturgy, more than to too many of the occupiers of our pulpits, they are forced upon our notice in their just bearings and connections, as often as we attend the service of the church. Yet is it too much to affirm that, though there entertained with decorum, as what belong to the day and place and occupation, they are yet too generally heard of with little interest, like the legendary tales of some venerable historian, or like other transactions of great antiquity, if not of doubtful credit, which, though important to our ancestors, relate to times and circumstances so different from our own that we cannot be expected to take any great concern in them? We hear them therefore with apparent indifference; we repeat them almost as it were by rote, assuming by turns the language of the deepest humiliation and of the warmest thankfulness, with a calm unaltered composure; and when the service of the day is ended, they are dismissed altogether from our thoughts, till, on the return of another Sunday, a fresh attendance on public worship gives occasion for the renewed expressions of our periodical humility and gratitude. In noticing such lukewarmness as this, surely the writer were to be pardoned if he were to be betrayed into some warmth of condemnation. The Unitarian and Socinian, indeed, who deny or explain away the peculiar doctrines of the gospel, may be allowed not to feel these grand truths, and so talk of them with little emotion. But in those who profess a sincere belief in them this coldness is insupportable. The greatest possible services of man to man must appear contemptible when compared with “the unspeakable mercies of Christ;” mercies so dearly bought, so freely bestowed—a deliverance from eternal misery—the gift of “a crown of glory that fadeth not away.” Yet, what judgment should we form of such conduct as is here censured, in the case of any one who had received some signal services from a fellow-creature? True love is an ardent and an active principle; a cold, a dormant, a phlegmatic gratitude, are contradictions in terms. When these generous affections really exist in us in vigour, are we not ever fond of dwelling on the value and enumerating the merits of our benefactor? How are we moved when anything is asserted to his disparagement ! How do we delight to tell of his kindness ! With what pious care do we preserve any memorial of him which we may happen to possess ! How gladly do we seize any opportunity of rendering to him, or to those who are dear to him, any little good offices which, though in themselves of small intrinsic worth, may testify the sincerity of our thankfulness ! The very mention of his name will cheer the heart and light up the countenance ! And if he be now no more, and if he had made it his dying request, that, in a way of his own appointment, we would occasionally meet to keep the memory of his person and of his services in lively exercise, how should we resent the idea of failing in the performance of so sacred an obligation !

Such are the genuine characters, such the natural workings, of a lively gratitude. And can we believe, without doing violence to the most established principles of human nature, that where the effects are so different, the internal principle is in truth the same ?

If the love of Christ be thus languid in the bulk of nominal Christians, their joy and trust in him cannot be expected to be very vigorous. Here again we find reason to remark, that there is nothing distinct, nothing specific, nothing which implies a mind acquainted with the nature of the Christian's privileges, and familiarized with their use—habitually solacing itself with the hopes held out by the gospel, and animated by the sense of its high endowments, and its glorious reversion.

The doctrine of the sanctifying operations of the Holy Spirit appears to have met with still worse treatment. It would be to convey a very inadequate idea of the scantiness of the conceptions on this head, of the bulk of the Christian world, to affirm merely that they are too little conscious of the inefficacy of their own unassisted endeavours after holiness of heart and life, and that they are not daily employed in humbly and diligently using the appointed means for the reception and cultivation of the divine assistance. We should hardly go beyond the truth in asserting, that, for the most part, their notions on this subject are so confused and faint that they can scarcely be said in any fair sense to believe the doctrine at all.

The writer of these sheets is by no means unapprized of the objections which he may expect from those whose opinions he has been so freely condemning. He is prepared to hear it urged, “that often, where there have been the strongest pretences to the religious affections, there has been little or nothing of the reality of them; and that, even omitting the instances, which however have been but too frequent, of studied hypocrisy, those affections which have assumed to themselves the name of religious have been merely the flights of a lively imagination, or the working of a heated brain; in particular, that this love of our Saviour, which has been so warmly recommended, is no better than a vain fervour, which dwells only in the disordered mind of the enthusiast; that Religion is of a more steady nature—of a more sober and manly quality; and that she rejects with scorn the support of a mere feeling, so volatile and indeterminate, so trivial and useless, as that with which we would associate her—a feeling varying in different men, and even in the same man at different times, according to the accidental flow of the animal spirits—a feeling, of which it may perhaps be said, we are, from our very nature, hardly susceptible towards an invisible Being.”

“As to the operations of the Holy Spirit,” it may probably be further urged, “it is perhaps scarcely worth while to spend much time in enquiring into the theory, when, in practice at least, it is manifest that there is no sure criterion whereby any one can ascertain the reality of them, even in his own case, much less in that of another. All we know is, that pretenders to these extraordinary assistances have never been wanting to abuse the credulity of the vulgar, and to try the patience of the wise. From the canting hypocrites and wild fanatics of the last century, to their less dangerous, chiefly because less successful, descendants of the present day, we hear the same unwarranted claims, the same idle tales, the same low cant; and we may discern not seldom the same mean artifices and mercenary ends. The doctrine, to say the best of it, can only serve to favour the indolence of man, while professing to furnish him with a compendious method of becoming wise and good, it supersedes the necessity of his own personal labours. Quitting therefore all such slothful and chimerical speculations, it is true wisdom to attach ourselves to what is more solid and practical; to the work, which you will not deny to be sufficiently difficult to find us of itself full employment, the work of rectifying the disorders of the passions, and of implanting and cultivating the virtues of the moral character.”—“It is the service of the understanding which God requires of us, which you would degrade into a mere matter of bodily temperament and imaginary impulses. You are contending for that which not only is altogether unworthy of our divine Master, but which, with considerate men, has ever brought his religion into suspicion and disrepute, and, under a show of honouring him, serves only to injure and discredit his cause.” Our objector, warming as he proceeds, will perhaps assume a more impatient tone. “Have not these doctrines,” he may exclaim, “been ever perverted to purposes the most disgraceful to the religion of Jesus? If you want an instance, look to the standard of the Inquisition, and behold the pious Dominicans torturing their miserable victims for the love of Christ.* Or would you rather see the effects of your principles on a larger scale, and by wholesale, if the phrase may be pardoned, cast your eyes across the Atlantic, and let your zeal be edified by the holy activity of Cortez and Pizzaro, and their apostles of the western hemisphere. To what else have been owing the extensive ravages of national persecutions, and religious wars and crusades—whereby rapacity and pride and cruelty, sheltering themselves under the mask of this specious principle, have so often afflicted the world? The Prince of Peace has been made to assume the port of a ferocious conqueror, and, forgetting the message of goodwill to men, has issued forth, like a second Scourge of the Earth,† to plague and desolate the human species.”

* This was the motto on their banner.

† Title of Attila, a king of the Huns, whose desolating ravages are well known.

That the sacred name of Religion has been too often prostituted to the most detestable purposes—that furious bigots and bloody persecutors, and self-interested hypocrites, of all qualities and dimensions, from the rapacious leader of an army to the canting oracle of a congregation, have falsely called themselves Christians—are melancholy and humiliating truths, which (as none so deeply lament them) none will more readily admit than they who best understand the nature of Christianity, and are most concerned for her honour. We are ready to acknowledge also, without dispute, that the religious affections, and the doctrine of divine assistance, have at all times been more or less disgraced by the false pretences and extravagant conduct of wild fanatics and brainsick enthusiasts. All this, however, is only as it happens in other instances, wherein the depravity of man perverts the bounty of God. Why is it here only to be made an argument, that there is danger of abuse? So is there also in the case of every operative principle, whether in the natural or moral world. Take, for an instance, the powers and properties of matter. These were doubtless designed by Providence for our comfort and wellbeing; yet they are often misapplied to trifling purposes, and still more frequently turned into so many agents of misery and death. On this fact indeed is founded the well known maxim, not more trite than just, that “the best things when corrupted become the worst,” a maxim which is peculiarly just in the instance of Religion. For in this case it is not merely, as in some others, that a great power, when mischievously applied, must be hurtful in proportion to its strength; but that the very principle, on which in general we depend for restraining and retarding the progress of evil, not only ceases to interpose any kindly check, but is powerfully active in the opposite direction. But will you therefore discard religion altogether? It is upon this very ground that the Infidels of a neighbouring country have lately made war against Christianity; with what effects the world has not now to learn. But suppose Religion were discarded, then Liberty remains to plague the world; a power which, though, when well employed, the dispenser of light and happiness, has been often proved, eminently proved, in the instance of a neighbouring country, to be capable, when abused, of becoming infinitely mischievous. Well then, extinguish Liberty. Then what more abused by false pretenders than Patriotism? Well, extinguish Patriotism. But then the wicked career to which we have adverted must have been checked but for Courage. Blot out Courage—and so might you proceed to extinguish, one by one, Reason, and Speech, and Memory, and all the discriminating prerogatives of man. But perhaps more than enough has been already urged in reply to an objection, which is built on ground so indefensible as that which would equally warrant our condemning any physical or moral faculty altogether, on account of its being occasionally abused.

As to the position of our opponent, that there is no way whereby the validity of any pretensions to the religious affections may be ascertained, it must partly be admitted. Doubtless we are not able always to read the hearts of men, and to discover their real characters; and hence it is that we in some measure lie open to the false and hypocritical pretences which are brought forward against us so triumphantly. But then these pretences no more prove all similar claims to be founded in falsehood and hypocrisy, than there having been many false and interested pretenders to wisdom and honesty would prove that there can be no such thing as a wise or an honest man. We do not argue thus but where our reason is under a corrupt bias. Why should we be so much surprised and scandalized when these impostors are detected in the church of Christ? It is no more than our blessed Master himself taught us to expect; and when the old difficulty is stated, "Didst thou not sow good seed in thy field, whence then hath it tares?" his own answer furnishes the best solution—"An enemy hath done this."—Hypocrisy is indeed detestable, and enthusiasm sufficiently mischievous to justify our guarding against its approaches with jealous care. Yet it may not be improper to take this occasion for observing, that we are now and then apt to draw too unfavourable conclusions from unpleasant appearances, which may perhaps be chiefly or altogether owing to gross or confused conceptions, or to a disgusting formality of demeanour, or to indeterminate, low, or improperly familiar expressions. The mode and language in which a vulgar man will express himself on the subject of Religion will probably be vulgar, and it is difficult for people of literature and refinement not to be unreasonably shocked by such vulgarities. But we should at least endeavour to correct the rash judgments which we may be disposed to form on these occasions, and should learn to recognise and to prize a sound texture and just configuration, though disguised beneath a homely or uncouth drapery. It was an apostle who declared that he had come to the learned and accomplished Grecians, "not with excellency of speech, or the wisdom of words." From these he had studiously abstained, lest he should have seemed to owe his success rather to the graces of oratory than to the efficacy of his doctrines and to the divine power with which they were accompanied. Even in our own times, when the extraordinary operations and miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit having ceased, the necessity of study and preparation, and of attention to manner as well as matter, in order to qualify men to become teachers of religion, are no longer superseded, it is no more than an act of justice explicitly to remark, that a body of Christians which, from the peculiarly offensive grossnesses of language in use among them, had, not without reason, excited suspicions of the very worst nature, have since reclaimed their character,* and have perhaps excelled all mankind in solid and unequivocal proofs of the love of Christ, and of the most ardent and active and patient zeal in his service. It is a zeal tempered with prudence, softened with meekness, soberly aiming at great ends by the gradual operation of well-adapted means, supported by a courage which no danger can intimidate, and a quiet constancy which no hardships can exhaust.

* See the Testimony of West India Merchants to the Moravians, in the Report of the Privy Council on the Slave Trade.

SECT. II.

On the Admission of the Passions into Religion.

The objection of our opponent, that, by insisting on the obligation of making our blessed Saviour the object of our affections we are degrading our religious services, and are substituting a set of mere feelings in place of the worship of the understanding, is an objection which deserves our most serious consideration. If it be just, it is decisive; for ours must be unquestionably “a reasonable service.” The objector must mean, either that these affections are unreasonable in themselves, or that they are misplaced in Religion. He can scarcely, however, intend that the affections are in their own nature unreasonable. To suppose him to maintain this position were to suppose him ignorant of what every schoolboy knows of the mechanism of the human mind. We shall therefore take it for granted that this cannot be his meaning, and proceed to examine the latter part of the alternative. Here also it may either be intended, that the affections are misplaced in religion generally, or that our blessed Saviour is not the proper object of them.

This notion of the affections being out of place in Religion is indeed an opinion which appears to be generally prevalent. The affections are regarded as the strongholds of enthusiasm. It is therefore judged most expedient to act as prudent generals are used to do when they raze the fortress or spike the cannon which are likely to fall into the hands of an enemy. Mankind are apt to be the dupes of misapplied terms; and the progress of the persuasion now in question has been considerably aided by an abuse of language not sufficiently checked in its first advances, whereby that species of Religion which is opposite to the warm and affectionate kind has been suffered, almost without disturbance, to usurp to itself the epithet of rational. But let not this claim be too hastily admitted. Let the position in question be thoroughly and impartially discussed, and it will appear, if I mistake not, to be a gross and pernicious error. If amputation be indeed indispensable, we must submit to it; but we may surely expect to be heard with patience, or rather with favour and indulgence, while we proceed to show that there is no need to have recourse to so desperate a remedy. The discussion will necessarily draw us into length. But our prolixity will not be greater than may well be claimed by the importance of the subject, especially as it scarcely seems to have hitherto sufficiently engaged the attention of writers on the subject of Religion.

It cannot, methinks, but afford a considerable presumption against the doctrine which we are about to combat, that it proposes to exclude at once from the service of Religion so grand a part of the composition of man; that in this, our noblest employment, it condemns as worse than useless all the most active principles of our nature. One cannot but suppose that, like the organs of the body, so the elementary qualities and original passions of the mind were all given us for valuable purposes by our all-wise Creator. It is indeed one of the sad evidences of our fallen condition, that they are now perpetually rebelling against the powers of reason and conscience, to which they should be subject. But even if Revelation had been silent, natural reason might have, in some degree, presumed that it would be the effect of a religion which should come from God, completely to repair the consequences of our superinduced depravity. The schemes of mere human wisdom had indeed tacitly confessed that this was a task beyond their strength. Of the two most celebrated systems of philosophy, the one expressly confirmed the usurpation of the passions; while the other, despairing of being able to regulate them, saw nothing left but their extinction. The former acted like a weak government, which gives independence to a rebellious province which it cannot reduce. The latter formed its boasted scheme merely upon the plan of that barbarous policy which composes the troubles of a turbulent land by the extermination of its inhabitants. This is the calm, not of order, but of inaction; it is not tranquillity, but the stillness of death.

Trucidare falso nomine imperium, et ubi solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant.—TACIT.

Christianity, we might hope, would not be driven to any such wretched expedients, nor, in fact, does she condescend to them. They only thus undervalue her strength who mistake her character and are ignorant of her powers. It is her peculiar glory, and her special office, to bring all the faculties of our nature into their just subordination and dependence, that so the whole man, complete in all his functions, may be restored to the true ends of his being, and be devoted, entire and harmonious, to the service and glory of God. “My son, give me thine heart.”—“Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart.”—Such are the direct and comprehensive claims which are made on us in the holy Scriptures. We can scarcely indeed look into any part of the sacred volume without meeting abundant proofs that it is the religion of the affections which God particularly requires. Love, Zeal, Gratitude, Joy, Hope, Trust, are each of them specified; and are not allowed to us as weaknesses, but enjoined on us as our bounden duty, and commended to us as our acceptable worship. Where passages are so numerous, there would be no end of particular citations. Let it be sufficient, therefore, to refer the reader to the word of God. There let him observe too, that as the lively exercise of the passions towards their legitimate object is always spoken of with praise, so a cold, hard, unfeeling heart is represented as highly criminal. Luke-warmness is stated to be the object of God’s disgust and aversion: zeal and love, of his favour and delight; and the taking away of the heart of stone, and the implanting of a warmer and more tender nature in its stead, are specifically promised as the effects of his returning favour, and the work of his renewing grace. It is the prayer of an inspired teacher, in behalf of those for whom he was most interested, “that their love,” already acknowledged to be great, “might abound yet more and more.” Those modes of worship are prescribed which are best calculated to excite the dormant affections, and to maintain them in lively exercise; and the aids of music and singing are expressly superadded to increase their effect. If we look to the most eminent of the Scripture characters, we shall find them warm, zealous, and affectionate. When engaged in their favourite work of celebrating the goodness of their Supreme Benefactor, their souls appear to burn within them, their hearts kindle into rapture; the powers of language are inadequate to the expression of their transports; and they call on all nature to swell the chorus, and to unite with them in hallelujahs of gratitude and joy and praise. The man after God's own heart most of all abounds in these glowing effusions; and his compositions appear to have been given us in order to set the tone, as it were, to all succeeding generations. Accordingly, to quote the words of a late excellent prelate,* who was himself warmed with the same heavenly flame, "in the language of this divine book, the praises of the church have been offered up to the throne of grace from age to age." When God was pleased to check the future apostle of the Gentiles in his wild career, and to make him a monument of transforming grace, was the force of his affections diminished, or was it not that their direction only was changed? He brought his affections entire and unabated into the service of his blessed Master. His zeal now burned even with an increase of brightness; and no intenseness, no continuance of sufferings, could allay its ardour, or damp the fervours of his triumphant exultations. Finally—The worship and service of the glorified spirits in heaven is not represented to us as a cold intellectual investigation, but as the worship and service of gratitude and love. And surely it will not be disputed, that it should be even here the humble endeavour of those who are promised, while on earth, “to be made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light,” to bring their hearts into a capacity for joining in those everlasting praises.

* Dr. HORNE.

But it may not be unadvisable for the writer here to guard against a mistaken supposition, from which the mind of our objector by no means appears exempt, that the force of the religious affections is to be chiefly estimated by the degree of mere animal fervour—by ardours and transports and raptures, of which, from constitutional temperament, a person may be easily susceptible, or into which daily experience must convince us, that people of strong imaginations and of warm passions may work themselves without much difficulty, where their hearts are by no means truly or deeply interested. Every tolerable actor can attest the truth of this remark. These high degrees of the passions bad men may experience, good men may want. They may be affected; they may be genuine; but whether genuine or affected, they form not the true standard by which the real nature or strength of the religious affections is to be determined. To ascertain these points, we must examine whether they appear to be grounded in knowledge—to have their root in strong and just conceptions of the great and manifold excellencies of their object, or to be ignorant, unmeaning, or vague; whether they are natural and easy, or constrained and forced—wakeful, and apt to fix on their great objects, and delighting in the exercises of prayer and praise and religious contemplation, which may be called their proper nutriment, or voluntarily omitting suitable occasions of receiving it, looking forward to such opportunities with little expectation, looking back on them with little complacency, and being disappointed of them with little regret,—we must observe whether these religious affections are merely occasional visitants, or the abiding inmates of the soul; whether they have got the mastery over the vicious passions and propensities, with which, in their origin and nature and tendency, they are at open variance, or whether, if the victory be not yet complete, the war is at least constant, and the breach irreconcilable; whether they moderate and regulate all the inferior appetites and desires which are culpable only in their excess, thus striving to reign in the bosom with a settled undisputed predominance: and we must examine whether, above all, they manifest themselves by prompting to the active discharge of the duties of life, the personal, the domestic, the professional, the social, and civil duties. Here the wideness of their range and the universality of their influence will generally serve to distinguish them from those partial efforts of diligence and self-denial to which mankind are prompted by subordinate motives. All proofs other than this, deduced from conduct, are in some degree ambiguous. This, this only, whether we argue from Reason or from Scripture, is a sure infallible criterion. From the daily incidents of conjugal and domestic life, we learn, that a heat of affection occasionally vehement, but superficial and transitory, may consist too well with a course of conduct exhibiting incontestable proofs of neglect and unkindness. But the passion which alone the holy Scriptures dignify with the name of Love, is a deep, not a superficial feeling—a fixed and permanent, not an occasional emotion. It proves the validity of its title, by actions corresponding with its nature, by practical endeavours to gratify the wishes and to promote the interests of the object of affection. “If a man love me, he will keep my sayings.” “This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments.” This therefore is the best standard by which to try the quality, or, the quality being ascertained, to estimate the strength, of the religious affections. Without suffering ourselves to derive too much complacency from transient fervours of devotion, we should carefully and frequently prove ourselves by this less doubtful test, impartially examining our daily conduct, and often comparing our actual with our possible services—the fair amount of our exertions with our natural or acquired means and opportunities of usefulness.

After this large explanation, the prolixity of which will, we trust, be pardoned on account of the importance of the subject, and the danger of mistakes both on the right hand and on the left, we are perfectly ready to concede to the objector, that the religious affections must be expected to be more or less lively in different men, and in the same man at different times, in proportion to natural tempers, ages, situations, and habits of life. But, to found an objection on this ground would be as unreasonable as it would be altogether to deny the obligation of the precepts which command us to relieve the necessities of the indigent, because the infinitely varying circumstances of mankind must render it impossible to specify beforehand the sum which each individual ought on the whole to allot to this purpose, or to fix, in every particular instance, on any determinate measure and mode of contribution. To the one case no less than to the other, we may apply the maxim of an eminent writer: "An honest heart is the best casuist." He who everywhere but in religion is warm and animated, there only phlegmatic and cold, can hardly expect, especially if this coldness be not the subject of unfeigned humiliation and sorrow, that his plea on the ground of natural temper should be admitted any more than that of a person who should urge his poverty as a justification of his not relieving the wants of the necessitous, at the very time of his launching out into expence without restraint, on occasions in which he was really prompted by his inclinations. In both cases, "it is the willing mind which is required." Where that is found, every "man will be judged according to what he hath, and not according to what he hath not.

After the decisive proofs already adduced from the word of God, of the unreasonableness of the objection to admitting the passions into Religion, all further arguments may appear superfluous to any one who is exposed to bow to scriptural authority. Yet the point is of so much importance, and, it is to be feared, so little regarded, that it may not be amiss to continue the discussion. The best conclusions of reason will be shown to fall in with what clearly appears to be the authoritative language of revelation; and to call in the aid of the affections to the service of religion will prove to be not only what sober reason may permit as in some sort allowable, but what she clearly and strongly dictates to our deliberate judgments as indispensably requisite for us in the circumstances wherein we are placed. We have every one of us a work to accomplish, wherein our eternal interests are at stake—a work to which we are naturally indisposed. We live in a world abounding with objects which distract our attention and divert our endeavours; and a deadly enemy is ever at hand to seduce and beguile us. If we persevere indeed, success is certain; but our efforts must know no remission. There is a call on us for vigorous and continual resolution, self-denial, and activity. Now, man is not a being of mere intellect.

Video meliora proboque, deteriora sequor,

is a complaint which, alas! we all of us might daily utter. The slightest solicitation of appetite is often able to draw us to act in opposition to our clearest judgment, our highest interests, and most resolute determinations. Sickness, poverty, disgrace, and even eternal misery itself, sometimes in vain solicit our notice; they are all excluded from our view, and thrust as it were beyond the sphere of vision, by some poor unsubstantial transient object, so minute and contemptible as almost to escape the notice of the eye of reason.

These observations are more strikingly confirmed in our religious concerns than in any other; because in them the interests at stake are of transcendent importance; but they hold equally in every instance according to its measure, wherein there is a call for laborious, painful, and continued exertions, from which we are likely to be deterred by obstacles, or seduced by the solicitations of pleasure. What then is to be done in the case of any such arduous and necessary undertaking? The answer is obvious—You should endeavour not only to convince the understanding, but also to affect the heart; and for this end you must secure the reinforcement of the passions. This is indeed the course which would be naturally followed by every man of common understanding who should know that some one, for whom he was deeply interested, a child, for instance, or a brother, were about to enter on a long, difficult, perilous, and critical adventure, wherein success was to be honour and affluence—defeat was to be contempt and ruin. And still more, if the parent were convinced, that his child possessed faculties which, strenuously and unremittingly exerted, would prove equal to all the exigencies of the enterprise; but knew him also to be volatile and inconstant, and had reason to doubt his resolution and his vigilance; how would the friendly monitor's endeavour be redoubled, so to possess his pupil's mind with the worth and dignity of the undertaking, that there should be no opening for the entrance of any inferior consideration!—"Weigh well (he would say) the value of the object for which you are about to contend, and contemplate and study its various excellencies, till your whole soul be on fire for its acquisition. Consider too, that if you fail, misery and infamy are united in the alternative which awaits you. Let not the mistaken notion, of its being a safe and easy service, for a moment beguile you into the discontinuance or remission of your efforts. Be aware of your imminent danger, and at the same time know your true security. It is a service of labour and peril; but one wherein the powers which you possess, strenuously and perseveringly exerted, cannot but crown you with victory. Accustom yourself to look first to the dreadful consequences of failure; then fix your eye on the glorious prize which is before you; and when your strength begins to fail, and your spirits are well nigh exhausted, let the animating view rekindle your resolution, and call forth in renewed vigour the fainting energies of your soul."

It was the remark of an unerring observer, "The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." And it is indisputably true, that in religion we have to argue and plead with men for principles of action, the wisdom and expediency of which are universally acknowledged in matters of worldly concern. So it is in the instance before us. The case which has been just described is an exact but a faint representation of our condition in this life. Frail and "infirm of purpose," we have a business to execute of supreme and indispensable necessity. Solicitations to neglect it everywhere abound; the difficulties and dangers are numerous and urgent; and the night of death cometh, how soon we know not, "when no man can work." All this is granted. It seems to be a state of things wherein one should look out with solicitude for some powerful stimulants. Mere knowledge is confessedly too weak. The affections alone remain to supply the deficiency. They precisely meet the occasion, and suit the purposes intended. Yet, when we propose to fit ourselves for our great undertaking, by calling them in to our help, we are to be told that we are acting contrary to reason. Is this reasonable, to strip us first of our armour of proof, and then to send us to the sharpest of encounters—to summon us to the severest labours, but first to rob us of the precious cordials which should brace our sinews and recruit our strength?

Let these pretended advocates for reason at length then confess their folly, and do justice to the superior wisdom as well as goodness of our heavenly Instructor, who, better understanding our true condition, and knowing our forwardness and inadvertency, has most reasonably as well as kindly pointed out and enjoined on us the use of those aids which may counteract our infirmities—who, commanding the effect, has commanded also the means whereby it may be accomplished.

And now, if the use of the affections in religion, in general, be at length shown to be conformable to reason, it will not require many words to prove that our blessed Saviour is the proper object of them. We know that love, gratitude, joy, hope, trust, have all their appropriate objects. Now, it must be at once conceded, that if these appropriate objects be not exhibited, it is perfectly unreasonable to expect that the correspondent passions should be excited. If we ask for love, in the case of an object which has no excellence or desirableness—for gratitude, where no obligation has been conferred—for joy, where there is no just cause of self-congratulation—for hope, where nothing is expected—for trust, where there exists no ground of reliance; then, indeed, we must kiss the rod, and patiently submit to correction.

This would be indeed Egyptian bondage, to demand the effects without the means of producing them. Is the case then so? Are we ready to adopt the language of the avowed enemies of our adorable Saviour, and again to say of him, “in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily,” that “he hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him?” Is it no obligation, that “he who thought it no robbery to be equal with God,” should yet, for our sakes, “make himself of no reputation, and take upon him the form of a servant, and be made in the likeness of men; and humble himself, and become obedient unto death, even the death of the cross?” Is it no cause of “joy that to us is born a Saviour,” by whom we may “be delivered from the power of darkness, and be made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light?” Can there be a “hope comparable to that of our calling”—“which is Christ in us, the hope of glory?” Can there be a trust to be preferred to the reliance on “Christ Jesus, who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever?” Surely, if our opponent be not dead to every generous emotion, he cannot look his own objection in the face, without a blush of shame and indignation.

But, forced at last to retreat from his favourite position, and compelled to acknowledge that his religious affections towards our blessed Saviour are not unreasonable, the objector still maintains the combat, suggesting that, by the very constitution of our nature, we are not susceptible of them towards an invisible Being; with regard to whom, it is added, we are shut out from all those means of communication and intercourse which knit and cement the union between man and man.

We mean not to deny that there is something in this objection. It might even seem to plead the authority of Scripture in its favour—"Mine eye affecteth mine heart;" and still more—"He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" It was indeed no new remark in Horace's days,

Segnius irritant animos demissa per aures, Quam quæ sunt oculis subjecta fidelibus.

We receive impressions more readily from visible objects, we feel them more strongly, we retain them more durably. But though it must be granted, that this circumstance makes it a more difficult task to preserve the affections in question in a healthful and vigorous state, is it thereby rendered impossible? This were indeed a most precipitate conclusion; and any one who should be disposed to admit the truth of it, might be at least induced to hesitate, when he should reflect that the argument applies equally against the possibility of the love of God, a duty of which the most cursory reader of Scripture, if he admit its divine authority, cannot but acknowledge the indispensable obligation. But we need only look back to the Scripture proofs which have been already adduced, to be convinced that the religious affections are therein inculcated on us as a matter of high and serious obligation. Hence we may be assured, that the impossibility stated by our opponent does not exist.

Let us scrutinize this matter, however, a little more minutely, and we shall be compelled to acknowledge, that the objection vanishes when we fairly and accurately investigate the circumstances of the case. With this view, let us look a little into the nature of the affections of the human mind, and endeavour to ascertain whence it is that they derive their nutriment, and are found from experience to increase in strength.

The state of man is such that his feelings are not the obedient servants of his reason, prompt at once to follow its dictates as to their direction and their measure. Excellence is the just object of love; good in expectancy—of hope; evil to be apprehended—of fear; the misfortunes and sufferings of our fellow-creatures constitute the just objects of pity. Each of these passions, it might be thought, would be excited, in proportion to what our reason should inform us were the magnitude and consequent claims of its corresponding object. But this is by no means the case. Take first, for a proof, the instance of pity. We read of slaughtered thousands with less emotion than we hear the particulars of a shocking accident which has happened in the next street; the distresses of a novel, which at the same time we know to be fictitious, affect us more than the dry narrative of a battle. We become so much interested by these incidents of the imagination, that we cannot speedily banish them from our thoughts, nor recover the tone of our minds; and often, we scarcely bring ourselves to lay down our book at the call of real misfortune, of which perhaps we go to the relief, on a principle of duty, but with little sense of interest or emotion of tenderness. It were easy to show that it is much the same in the case of the other affections. Whatever be the cause of this disproportion, which, as metaphysics fall not within our province, we shall not stop to examine, the fact is undeniable. There appears naturally to be a certain strangeness between the passion and its object, which familiarity and the power of habit must gradually overcome. You must contrive to bring them into close contact; they must be jointed and glued together by the particularities of little incidents. Thus, in the production of heat in the physical world, the flint and the steel produce not the effect without collision; the rudest barbarian will tell us the necessity of attrition, and the chemist of mixture. Now, an object, it is admitted, is brought into closer contact with its corresponding passion, by being seen and conversed with. This we grant is one way; but does it follow that there is no other? To assert this would be something like maintaining, in contradiction to universal experience, that objects of vision alone are capable of attracting our regard. But nothing can be more unfounded than such a supposition. It might seem too near an approach to the ludicrous to suggest, as an example to the contrary, the metaphysician's attachment to his unsubstantial speculations, or the zeal displayed in the pursuit, of abstract sciences, where there is no idea of bringing them "within the visible diurnal sphere," to the vulgarity of practical application. The instance of novel reading proves that we may be extremely affects by what we know to be merely ideal incidents and beings. By much thinking or talking of any one—by using our minds to dwell on his excellencies—by placing him in imaginary situations which interest and affect us—we find ourselves becoming insensibly more and more attached to him ; whereas it is the surest expedient for extinguishing an attachment which already exists, to engage in such occupations or society as may cause our casual thoughts and more fixed meditations to be diverted from the object of it. Ask a mother who has been long separated from her child, especially if he has been in circumstances of honour or of danger, to draw her attention to him, and to keep it in wakefulness and exercise, and she will tell you, that so far from becoming less dear, he appears to have grown more the object of her affections. She seems to herself to love him even better than the child who has been living under her roof, and has been daily in her view. How does she rejoice in his good fortune, and weep over his distresses ! With what impatience does she anticipate the time of his return !

Extra flammantia mœnia mundi,

We find, therefore, that sight and personal intercourse do not seem necessary to the production or increase of attachment, where the means of close contact have been afforded : but, on the other hand, if an object has been prevented from coming into close contact, sight and personal intercourse are not sufficient to give it the power of exciting the affections in proportion to its real magnitude. Suppose the case of a person whom we have often seen, and may have occasionally conversed with, and of whom we have been told in the general, that he possesses extraordinary merits. We assent to the assertion. But if we have no knowledge of particulars, no close acquaintance with him, nothing in short which brings his merits home to us, they interest us less than a far inferior degree of the very same qualities in one of our common associates. A parent has several children, all constantly under his eye, and equally dear to him. Yet if any one of them be taken ill, it is brought into so much closer contact than before that it seems to absorb and engross the parent's whole affection. Thus then, though it will not be denied that an object by being visible may thereby excite its corresponding affection with more facility, yet this is manifestly far from being the prime consideration. And so far are we from being the slaves of the sense of vision that a familiar acquaintance with the intrinsic excellencies of an object, aided, it must be admitted, by the power of habit, will render us almost insensible to the impressions which its outward form conveys, and able entirely to lose the consciousness of an unsightly exterior.

We may be permitted to remark, that the foregoing observations furnish an explanation, less discreditable than that which has been sometimes given, of an undoubted phenomenon in the human mind, that the greatest public misfortunes, however the understanding may lecture, are apt really to affect our feelings less than the most trivial disaster which happens to ourselves. An eminent writer* scarcely overstated the point when he observed, "that it would occasion a man of humanity more real disturbance to know that he was the next morning to lose his little finger, than to hear that the great empire of China had been suddenly swallowed up by an earthquake. The thoughts of the former would keep him awake all night; in the latter case, after making many melancholy reflections on the precariousness of human life, and the vanity of all the labours of man which could thus be annihilated in a moment—after a little speculation too, perhaps, on the causes of the disaster, and its effects in the political and commercial world—he would pursue his business or his pleasure with the same ease and tranquillity as if no such accident had happened, and snore at night with the most profound serenity over the ruin of a hundred millions of his fellow-creatures. Selfishness is not the cause of this; for the most unfeeling brute on earth would surely think nothing of the loss of a finger, if he could thereby prevent so dreadful a calamity.” This doctrine of contact which has been opened above affords a satisfactory solution; and, from all that has been said, the circumstances by which the affections of the mind towards any particular object are generated and strengthened may be easily collected. The chief of these appear to be, whatever tends to give a distinct and lively impression of the object, by setting before us its minute parts, and by often drawing towards it the thoughts and affections, so as to invest it by degrees with a confirmed ascendancy; whatever tends to excite and to keep in exercise a lively interest in its behalf; in other words, full knowledge, distinct and frequent mental entertainment, and pathetic contemplations. Supposing these means to have been used in any given degree, it may be expected, that they will be more or less efficacious, in proportion as the intrinsic qualities of the object afford greater or less scope for their operation, and more or fewer materials with which to work. Can it then be conceived, that they will be of no avail when steadily practised in the case of our Redeemer? If the principles of love, and gratitude, and joy, and hope, and trust, are not utterly extinet within us, they cannot but be called forth by the various corresponding objects which that blessed contemplation would gradually bring forth to our view. Well might the language of the apostle be addressed to Christians: “Whom, having not seen, ye love: in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.”

* Dr. Adam Smith, in his Theory of Moral Sentiments.

But, in the present instance, fresh considerations pour in, still more to invalidate the plea of its being impossible to love an invisible being. Our blessed Saviour, if we may be permitted so to say, is not removed far from us: and the various relations in which we stand towards him seem purposely made known to us, in order to furnish so many different bonds of connection with him—so many consequent occasions of continual intercourse. He exhibits not himself to us “dark with excessive brightness,” but is let down as it were to the possibilities of human converse. We may not think that he is incapable of entering into our little concerns, and of sympathising with them, for we are graciously assured that he is not one “who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, having been in all points tempted like as we are.” The figures under which he is represented are such as convey ideas of the utmost tenderness. “He shall feed his flock like a shepherd; he shall gather the lambs in his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young.” “They shall not hunger nor thirst, neither shall the heat nor sun smite them; for he that hath mercy on them shall lead them, even by the springs of water shall he guide them.” “I will not leave you orphans,”* was one of his last consolatory declarations. The children of Christ are here separated indeed from the personal view of him; but not from his paternal affection and paternal care. Meanwhile let them quicken their regards by the animating anticipation of that blessed day when he “who is gone to prepare a place for them, will come again to receive them unto himself.” Then shall they be admitted to his more immediate presence: “Now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as I am known.”

Surely more than enough has been now said to prove that this particular case, from its very nature, furnishes the most abundant and powerful considerations and means for exciting the feelings; and it might be contended, without fear of refutation, that, by the diligent and habitual use of those considerations and means, we might, with confident expectation of success, engage in the work of raising our affections towards our blessed Saviour to a state of due force and activity. But, blessed be God, we have a still better reliance; for the grand circumstance of all yet remains behind, which the writer has been led to defer, from his wish to contend with his opponents on their own ground. This circumstance is, that here, no less than in other particulars, the Christian's hope is founded, not on the speculations or the strength of man, but on the declaration of Him who cannot lie, on the power of Omnipotence.

* The word ‘comfortless’ is rendered in the margin, Orphans.

We learn from the Scriptures that it is one main part of the operations of the Holy Spirit, to implant those heavenly principles in the human mind, and to cherish their growth. We are encouraged to believe that, in answer to our prayers, this aid from above will give efficacy to our earnest endeavours, if used in humble dependence on divine grace. We may therefore with confidence take the means which have been suggested. But let us, in our turn, be permitted to ask our opponents, have they humbly and perseveringly applied for this divine strength? or, disclaiming that assistance, perhaps, as tempting them to indolence, have they been so much the more strenuous and unwearied in the use of their own unaided endeavours; or, rather, have they not been equally negligent of both? Renouncing the one, they have wholly omitted the other. But this is far from being all. They even reverse all the methods which we have recommended as being calculated to increase regard; and exactly follow that course which would be pursued by any one who should wish to reduce an excessive affection. Yet thus leaving untried all the means which, whether from reason or Scripture, we maintain to be necessary to the production of the end, nay, using such as are of a directly opposite nature, these men presume to talk to us of impossibilities! We may rather contend, that they furnish a fresh proof of the soundness of our reasonings. We lay it down as a fundamental position, that speculative knowledge alone—mere superficial cursory considerations—will be of no avail; that nothing is to be done without the diligent continued use of the appointed method. They themselves afford an instance of the truth of our assertions; and while they supply no argument against the efficacy of the mode prescribed, they acknowledge at least that they are wholly ignorant of any other.

But let us now turn our eyes to Christians of a higher order, to those who have actually proved the truth of our reasonings—who have not only assumed the name, but who have possessed the substance, and felt the power of Christianity—who, though often foiled by their remaining corruptions, and shamed and cast down under a sense of their many imperfections, have known, in their better seasons, what it was to experience its firm hope, its dignified joy, its unshaken trust, its more than human consolations. In their hearts, love also towards their Redeemer has glowed; a love not superficial and unmeaning, but constant and rational, resulting from a strong impression of the worth of its object, and heightened by an abiding sense of great, unmerited, and continually accumulating obligations; ever manifesting itself in acts of diligent obedience, or of patient suffering. Such was the religion of the holy martyrs of the sixteenth century, the illustrious ornaments of the English Church. They realized the theory which we have now been faintly tracing. Look to their writings, and you will find that their thoughts and affections had been much exercised in habitual views of the blessed Jesus. Thus they used the required means. What were the effects? Persecution and distress, degradation and contempt, in vain assailed them—all these evils served but to bring their affections into closer contact with their object; and not only did their love feel no diminution or abatement, but it rose to all the exigencies of the occasion, and burned with an increase of ardour; even when brought forth at last to a cruel and ignominious death, they repined not at their fate; but rather rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer for the name of Christ. The writer might refer to still more recent times, to prove the reality of this divine principle. But, lest his authorities should be disputed, let us go to the apostles of our Lord; and while, on a cursory perusal of their writings, we must acknowledge that they commend and even prescribe to us the love of Christ as one of the chief of the Christian graces; so, on a more attentive inspection of those writings, we shall discover abundant proofs, that they were themselves bright examples of their own precept; that our blessed Saviour was really the object of our warmest affection, and what he had done and suffered for them, the continual subject of their grateful remembrance.

SECT. III.

Inadequate conceptions concerning the Holy Spirit's operations.

The disposition so prevalent in the bulk of nominal Christians, to form a religious system for themselves, instead of taking it from the word of God, is strikingly observable in their scarcely admitting, except in the most vague and general sense, the doctrine of the influence of the Holy Spirit. If we look into the Scriptures for information on this particular, we learn a very different lesson. We are in them distinctly taught, that “of ourselves we can do nothing”—that “we are by nature children of wrath,” and under the power of the evil spirit, our understandings being naturally dark, and our hearts averse from spiritual things; and we are directed to pray for the influence of the Holy Spirit to enlighten our understandings, to dissipate our prejudices, to purify our corrupt minds, and to renew us after the image of our heavenly Father. It is this influence which is represented as originally awakening us from slumber, as enlightening us in darkness, as “quickenings us when dead,” as “delivering us from the power of the devil,” as drawing us to God, as “translating us into the kingdom of his dear Son,” as “creating us anew in Christ Jesus,” as “dwelling in us, and walking in us;” so that “putting off the old man with his deeds,” we are to consider ourselves as “having put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him,” and as those who are to be “an habitation of God through the Spirit.” It is by this divine assistance only that we can grow in grace, and improve in all holiness. So expressly, particularly, and repeatedly, does the word of God inculcate these lessons, that one would think there was scarcely room for any difference of opinion among those who admit its authority. Sometimes* the whole of a Christian's repentance and faith, and consequent holiness, are ascribed generally to the divine influence; sometimes these are spoken of separately, and ascribed to the same almighty power. Sometimes different particular graces of the Christian character, those which respect our duties and tempers towards our fellow-creatures, no less than those which have reference to the Supreme Being, are particularly traced to this source. Sometimes they are all referred collectively to this common root, being comprehended under the compendious denomination of "the fruits of the Spirit." In exact correspondence with these representations, this aid from above is promised in other parts of Scripture for the production of those effects; and the withholding or withdrawing of it is occasionally threatened as a punishment for the sins of men, and as one of the most fatal consequences of the divine displeasure.

The Liturgy of the Church of England strictly agrees with the representation which has been here given of the instructions of the word of God.

SECT. IV.

Mistaken conceptions entertained by nominal Christians of the terms of acceptance with God.

If it be true, then, that, in contradiction to the plainest dictates of Scripture, and to the ritual of our Established Church, the sanctifying operations of the Holy Spirit (the first fruits of our reconciliation to God, the purchase of our Redeemer's death, and his best gift to his true disciples) are too generally undervalued and slighted; if it be also true, that our thoughts of the blessed Saviour are confused and faint, our affections towards him languid and lukewarm; little proportioned to what they, who at such a price have been rescued from ruin, and endowed with a title to eternal glory, might be justly expected to feel towards the Author of that deliverance; little proportioned to what has been felt by others, ransomed from the same ruin, and partakers of the same inheritance: if this, let it be repeated, be indeed so, let us not shut our eyes against the perception of our real state; but rather endeavour to trace the evil to its source. We are loudly called on to examine well our foundations. If any thing be there unsound and hollow, the superstructure could not be safe, though its exterior were less suspicious. Let the question then be asked, and let the answer be returned with all the consideration and solemnity which a question so important may justly demand, whether, in the grand concern of all, the means of a sinner's acceptance with God, there be not reason to apprehend, that the nominal Christians whom we have been addressing, too generally entertain very superficial and confused, if not highly dangerous notions? Is there not cause to fear, that, with little more than an indistinct and nominal reference to Him who "bore our sins in his own body on the tree," they really rest their eternal hopes on a vague, general persuasion of the unqualified mercy of the Supreme Being; or that, still more erroneously, they rely, in the main, on their own negative or positive merits? “They can look upon their lives with an impartial eye, and congratulate themselves on their inoffensiveness in society; on their having been exempt, at least, from any gross vice, or if sometimes accidentally betrayed into it, on its never having been indulged habitually; or, if not even so,” (for there are but few who can say this, if the term vice be explained according to the strict requisitions of the Scriptures,) “yet on the balance being in their favour, or on the whole not much against them, when their good and bad actions are fairly weighed, and due allowance is made for human frailty.” These considerations are sufficient for the most part to compose their apprehensions; these are the cordials which they find most at hand in the moments of serious thought, or of occasional dejection; and sometimes, perhaps, in seasons of less than ordinary self-complacency, they call in also to their aid the general persuasion of the unbounded mercy and pity of God. Yet persons of this description by no means disclaim a Saviour, or avowedly relinquish their title to a share in the benefits of his death. They close their petitions with the name of Christ; but if not chiefly from the effect of habit, or out of decent conformity to the established faith, yet surely with something of the same ambiguity of principle which influenced the expiring philosopher, when he ordered the customary mark of homage to be paid to the god of medicine.

* See Dr. Doddridge's Eight Sermons on Regeneration, a most valuable compilation; and M'Laurin's Essay on Divine Grace.

Others go farther than this; for there are many shades of difference between those who flatly renounce and those who cordially embrace the doctrine of redemption by Christ. This class has a sort of general, indeterminate, and ill understood dependence on our blessed Saviour. But their hopes, so far as they can be distinctly made out, appear ultimately to rest on the persuasion that they are now, through Christ, become members of a new dispensation, wherein they will be tried by a more lenient rule than that to which they must have been otherwise subject. “God will not now be extreme to mark what is done amiss; but will dispense with the rigorous exactions of his law, too strict indeed for such frail creatures as we are, to hope that we can fulfill it. Christianity has moderated the requisitions of divine justice; and all that is now required of us, is thankfully to trust to the merits of Christ for the pardon of our sins, and the acceptance of our sincere though imperfect obedience. The frailties and infirmities to which our nature is liable, or to which our situation in life exposes us, will not be severely judged; and as it is practice that really determines the character, we may rest satisfied, that if, on the whole, our lives be tolerably good, we shall escape with little or no punishment, and, through Jesus Christ our Lord, shall be finally partakers of heavenly felicity.”

We cannot dive into the human heart, and therefore should always speak with caution and diffidence, when, from external appearances or declarations, we are affirming the existence of any internal principles and feelings; especially as we are liable to be misled by the ambiguities of language, or by the inaccuracy with which others may express themselves. But it is sometimes not difficult to any one who is accustomed, if the phrase may be allowed, to the anatomy of the human mind, to discern, that, generally speaking, the persons who use the above language, rely not so much on the merits of Christ, and on the agency of divine grace, as on their own power of fulfilling the moderated requisitions of divine justice. He will hence therefore discover in them a disposition rather to extenuate the malignity of their disease, than to magnify the excellence of the proffered remedy. He will find them apt to palliate in themselves what they cannot fully justify, to enhance the merit of what they believe to be their good qualities and commendable actions, to set, as it were in an account, the good against the bad; and if the result be not very unfavourable, they conceive that they shall be entitled to claim the benefits of our Saviour's sufferings as a thing of course. They have little idea, so little, that it might almost be affirmed, that they have no idea at all of the importance or difficulty of the duty of what the Scripture calls, "submitting ourselves to the righteousness of God;" or of our proneness rather to justify ourselves in his sight, than, in the language of imploring penitents, to acknowledge ourselves guilty and helpless sinners. They have never summoned themselves to this entire and unqualified renunciation of their own merits, and their own strength; and therefore they remain strangers to the natural loftiness of the human heart, which such a call would have awakened into action, and roused to resistance.

ALL THESE THEIR SEVERAL ERRORS NATURALLY RESULT FROM THE MISTAKEN CONCEPTION ENTERTAINED OF THE FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF CHRISTIANITY. They consider not that Christianity is a scheme for “justifying the ungodly,” by Christ’s dying for them, “when yet sinners ;” * a scheme for reconciling us to God, “when enemies ;” and for making the fruits of holiness the effects, † not the cause, of our being justified and reconciled,—that, in short, it opens freely the door of mercy to the greatest and worst of penitent sinners, who, obeying the blessed impulse of the grace of God, whereby they had been awakened from the sleep of death, and moved to seek for pardon, may enter in, and, through the regenerating influence of the Holy Spirit, be enabled to bring forth the fruits of righteousness. But they rather conceive of Christianity as opening the door of mercy, that those who, on the ground of their own merits, could not have hoped to justify themselves before God, may yet be admitted for Christ’s sake, on condition of their having previously satisfied the moderated requisitions of Divine Justice.

* The writer trusts he cannot be misunderstood to mean that any, continuing sinners and ungodly, can, by believing, be accepted or finally saved. The following chapter, particularly the latter part of it, (Sect. 6,) would abundantly vindicate him from any such misconstruction. Meanwhile he will only remark, that true faith (in which repentance is considered as involved) is in Scripture regarded as the radical principle of holiness. If the root exists, the proper fruits will be brought forth. An attention to this consideration would have easily explained and reconciled those passages of St. Paul’s and St. James’s Epistles, which have furnished so much matter of argument and criticism. St. James, it may be observed, all along speaks not of a man who has faith, but who says that he hath faith. He contrasts pretended, imperfect, dead faith, with real, complete, living faith. This surely must appear decisively clear to those who observe, that the conclusion which he deduces from his whole reasoning in verses 23 and 26, respects faith : “Abraham believed God,” &c. “Faith without works,” &c. It is his great object to assert and establish the right kind of faith, and only to deny the utility or value of that which falsely usurps the name.—See James ii, 14, &c.

† See Chap. iv, Sect. 6.

In speaking to others also of the gospel scheme, they are apt to talk too much of terms and performances on our part, on which we become entitled to an interest in the sufferings of Christ, instead of stating the benefits of Christ's satisfaction as extended to us freely, "without money and without price."

The practical consequences of these errors are such as might be expected. They tend to prevent that sense which we ought to entertain of our own natural misery and helplessness, and that deep feeling of gratitude for the merits and intercession of Christ, to which we are wholly indebted for our reconciliation to God, and for the will and the power, from first to last, to work out our own salvation. They consider it too much in the light of a contract between two parties, wherein each, independently of the other, has his own distinct condition to perform: man—to do his duty; God—to justify and accept for Christ's sake: if they fail not in the discharge of their condition, assuredly the condition on God's part will be faithfully fulfilled. Accordingly we find, in fact, that they who represent the gospel scheme in the manner above described, give evidence of the subject with which their hearts are most filled, by their proneness to run into merely moral disquisitions, either not mentioning at all, or at least but cursorily touching on, the sufferings and love of their Redeemer; and are little apt to kindle at their Saviour's name, or, like the apostles, to be betrayed by their fervour into what may be almost an untimely descant on the riches of his unutterable mercy. In addressing others also whom they conceive to be living in habits of sin, and under the wrath of God, they rather advise them to amend their ways as a preparation for their coming to Christ, than exhort them to throw themselves with deep prostration of soul at the foot of the cross, there to obtain pardon, and find grace to help in time of need.

The great importance of the subject in question will justify the writer in having been thus particular. It has arisen from a wish that, on a matter of such magnitude, it should be impossible to mistake his meaning. But after all that has been said, let it also be remembered, that, except so far as the instruction of others is concerned, the point of importance is the internal disposition of the mind; and it is to be hoped, that a dependence for pardon and holiness may be placed where it ought to be, notwithstanding the vague manner in which men express themselves. Let us also hope, that He who searches the heart sees the right dispositions in many who use the mistaken and dangerous language to which we have objected.

If the preceding statement of the error so generally prevalent, concerning the nature of the gospel offer, be in any considerable degree just, it will then explain that languor in the affections towards our blessed Saviour, together with that inadequate impression of the necessity and value of the assistance of the Divine Spirit, which so generally prevail. According to the soundest principles of reasoning, it may be also adduced, as an additional proof of the correctness of our present statement, that it so exactly falls in with those phenomena, and so naturally accounts for them. For even admitting that the persons above mentioned, particularly the last class, do at the bottom rely on the atonement of Christ; yet, on their scheme, it must necessarily happen, that the object to which they are most accustomed to look, with which their thoughts are chiefly conversant, and from which they most habitually derive complacency, is rather their own qualified merit and services, though confessed to be inadequate, than the sufferings and atoning death of a crucified Saviour. The affections towards our blessed Lord, therefore, (according to the theory of the passions formerly laid down,) cannot be expected to flourish, because they receive not that which was shown to be necessary to their nutriment and growth. If we would love him as affectionately, and rejoice in him as triumphantly, as the first Christians did, we must learn like them to repose our entire trust in him, and to adopt the language of the apostle, “God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ,”—“Who of God is made unto us wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption.”

Doubtless there have been too many who, to their eternal ruin, have abused the doctrine of salvation by grace; and have vainly trusted in Christ for pardon and acceptance, when, by their vicious lives, they have plainly proved the groundlessness of their pretensions. The tree is to be known by its fruits; and there is too much reason to fear that there is no principle of faith, when it does not decidedly evince itself by the fruits of holiness. Dreadful indeed will be the doom, above that of all others, of those loose professors of Christianity, to whom, at the last day, our blessed Saviour will address those words, "I never knew you; depart from me, all ye that work iniquity." But the danger of error on this side ought not to render us insensible to the opposite error; an error against which in these days it seems particularly necessary to guard. It is far from the intention of the writer of this work to enter into the niceties of controversy. But surely, without danger of being thought to violate this design, he may be permitted to contend, that they who in the main believe the doctrines of the Church of England, are bound to allow, that our dependence on our blessed Saviour, as alone the meritorious cause of our acceptance with God, and as the means of all its blessed fruits and glorious consequences, must be not merely formal and nominal, but real and substantial; not vague, qualified, and partial, but direct, cordial, and entire.

"Repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ," was the sum of the apostolical instructions. It is not an occasional invocation of the name of Christ, or a transient recognition of his authority, that fills up the measure of the terms, believing in Jesus. This shall we find no such easy task: and, if we trust that we do believe, we should all perhaps do well to cry out in the words of an imploring suppliant, (he supplicated not in vain,) "Lord, help thou our unbelief." We must be deeply conscious of our guilt and misery, heartily repenting of our sins, and firmly resolving to forsake them; and thus penitently "fleeing for refuge to the hope set before us," we must found altogether on the merit of the crucified Redeemer our hopes of escape from their deserved punishment, and of deliverance from their enslaving power. This must be our first, our last, our only plea. We are to surrender ourselves up to Him to “be washed in his blood,” to be sanctified by his Spirit, resolving to receive him for our Lord and Master, to learn in his school, to obey all his commandments.

It may perhaps be not unnecessary, after having treated so largely on this important topic, to add a few words in order to obviate a charge which may be urged against us, that we are insisting on nice and abstruse distinctions in what is a matter of general concern; and this too in a system which, on its original promulgation, was declared to be peculiarly intended for the simple and poor. It will be abundantly evident, however, on a little reflection, and experience fully proves the position, that what has been required is not the perception of a subtile distinction, but a state and condition of heart. To the former, the poor and the ignorant must be indeed confessed unequal; but they are far less indisposed than the great and the learned, to bow down to that “preaching of the cross, which is to them that perish foolishness, but unto them that are saved the power of God and the wisdom of God.” The poor are not liable to be puffed up by the intoxicating fumes of ambition and worldly grandeur. They are less likely to be kept from entering into the straight and narrow way, and, when they have entered, to be drawn back again, or to be retarded in their progress, by the cares or pleasures of life. They may express themselves ill; but their views may be simple, and their hearts humble, penitent, and sincere. It is, as in other cases; the vulgar are the subjects of phenomena, the learned explain them: the former know nothing of the theory of vision or of sentiment; but this ignorance hinders them not from seeing and thinking; and though unable to discourse elaborately on the passions, they can feel warmly for their children, their friends, their country.

After this digression, if that be indeed a digression which, by removing a formidable objection, renders the truth of the positions we wish to establish more clear and less questionable, we may now resume the thread of our argument. Still entreating, therefore, the attention of those who have not been used to think much of the necessity of this undivided, and, if it may be so termed, unadulterated reliance, for which we have been contending; we would still more particularly address ourselves to others who are disposed to believe, that though, in some obscure and vague sense, the death of Christ, as the satisfaction for our sins, and for the purchase of our future happiness, and the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit, are to be admitted as fundamental articles of our creed, yet that these are doctrines so much above us, that they are not objects suited to our capacities: and that, turning our eyes therefore from these difficult speculations, we should fix them on the practical and moral precepts of the gospel. “ These it most concerns us to know; these therefore let us study. Such is the frailty of our nature, such the strength and number of our temptations to evil, that, in reducing the gospel morality to practice, we shall find full employment; and by attending to these moral precepts, rather than to those high mysterious doctrines which you are pressing on us, we shall best prepare to appear before God on that tremendous day, when ‘He shall judge every man according to his works.’ ”

“ Vain wisdom all, and false philosophy.”

It will at once destroy this flimsy web, to reply, in the words of our blessed Saviour, and of his beloved disciple—“ This is the work of God, that ye believe in him whom he hath sent.” “ This is his commandment, that we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ.” In truth, if we consider but for a moment the opinions of men who argue thus, we must be conscious of their absurdity. Let the modern Unitarians reduce the gospel to a mere system of ethics, but surely it is in the highest degree unreasonable to admit into our scheme all the grand peculiarities of Christianity, and having admitted, to neglect and think no more of them! “ Wherefore,” (might the Socinian say,) “ Wherefore all this costly and complicated machinery? It is like the Tychonic astronomy, encumbered and self-convicted by its own complicated relations and useless perplexities. It is so little like the simplicity of nature, it is so unworthy of the divine hand, that it even offends against those rules of propriety which we require to be observed in the imperfect compositions of the human intellect.”*

Well may the Socinian assume this lofty tone, with those whom we are now addressing. If these be indeed the doctrines of Revelation, common sense suggests to us, that, from their nature and their magnitude, they deserve our most serious regard. It is the very theology of Epicurus to allow the existence of these "heavenly things," but to deny their connection with human concerns, and their influence on human actions. Besides the unreasonableness of this conduct, we might strongly urge also in this connection the profaneness of thus treating, as matters of subordinate consideration, those parts of the system of Christianity, which are so strongly impressed on our reverence by the dignity of the Person to whom they relate. This very argument is indeed repeatedly and pointedly pressed by the sacred writers.*

* Nec Deus intersit, etc.

Nor is the profane irreverence of this conduct more striking than its ingratitude. When, from reading that our Saviour was "the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person, upholding all things by the word of his power," we go on to consider the purpose for which he came on earth, and all that he did and suffered for us—surely, if we have a spark of ingenuousness left within us, we shall condemn ourselves as guilty of the blackest ingratitude, in rarely noticing, or coldly turning away, on whatever shallow pretences, from the contemplation of these miracles of mercy. For those baser minds, however, on which fear alone can operate, that motive is superadded; and we are plainly forewarned, both directly and indirectly, by the example of the Jewish nation, that God will not hold them guiltless who are thus unmindful of his most signal acts of condescension and kindness. But as this is a question of pure Revelation, reasonings from probability may not be deemed decisive. To Revelation, therefore, we must appeal; and without entering into a laboured discussion of the subject, which might be to trespass on the reader's patience, I would refer him to the sacred writings themselves for complete satisfaction. We would earnestly recommend it to him to weigh, with the utmost seriousness, those passages of Scripture wherein the peculiar doctrines of Christianity are expressly mentioned; and further, to attend, with due regard, to the illustration and confirmation which the conclusions resulting from those passages incidentally receive from other parts of the word of God. They who maintain the opinion which we are combating will thereby become convinced that theirs is indeed an unscriptural religion; and will learn, instead of turning off their eyes from the grand peculiarities of Christianity, to keep these ever in view as the pregnant principles whence all the rest must derive their origin, and receive their best support.*

* See Hebrews ii, 1, &c.

Let us then, each for himself, solemnly ask our-

* Any one who wishes to investigate this subject, will do well to study attentively M-Laurin's Essay on Prejudices against the Gospel.—It may not be amiss here to direct the reader's attention to a few leading arguments, many of them those of the work just recommended. Let him maturely estimate the force of those terms whereby the apostle, in the following passages, designates and characterises the whole of the Christian system: "We preach Christ crucified."—"We determined to know nothing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified." The value of this argument will be acknowledged by all who consider, that a system is never designated by an immaterial or an inferior part of it, but by that which constitutes its prime consideration and essential distinction. The conclusion suggested by this remark, is confirmed by the Lord's Supper being the rite by which our Saviour himself commanded his disciples to keep him in remembrance; and, indeed, a similar lesson is taught by the Sacrament of Baptism, which shadows out our souls' being washed and purified by the blood of Christ. Observe, next, the frequency with selves, whether we have fled for refuge to the appointed hope, and whether we are habitually looking which our Saviour's death and suffering are introduced, and how often they are urged as practical motives.

"The minds of the apostles seem full of this subject. Every thing puts them in mind of it, they did not allow themselves to have it long out of their view, nor did any other branch of spiritual instruction make them lose sight of it." Consider, next, that part of the Epistle to the Romans, wherein St. Paul speaks of some who went about to establish their own righteousness, and had not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God. May not this charge be in some degree urged, and even more strongly than in the case of the Jews, against those who satisfy themselves with vague, general, occasional thoughts of our Saviour's mediation; and the source of whose habitual complacency, as we explained above, is rather their being tolerably well satisfied with their own characters and conduct? Yet St. Paul declares concerning those of whom he speaks, as concerning persons whose sad situation could not be too much lamented, that he had great heaviness and continual sorrow in his heart, adding still more emphatical expressions of deep and bitter regret.

Let the Epistle to the Galatians be also carefully examined and considered; and let it be fairly asked, what was the particular in which the Judaizing Christians were defective, and the want of which is spoken of in such strong terms as these—that it frustrates the grace of God, and must debar from all the benefits of the death of Jesus? The Judaizing converts were not immoral. They seem to have admitted the chief tenets concerning our Saviour. But they appeared to have been disposed to trust not wholly, be it observed also, but only in part, for their acceptance with God, to the Mosaic institutions, instead of reposing entirely on the merits of Christ. Here let it be remembered, that when a compliance with these institutions was not regarded as conveying this inference, the apostle showed by his own conduct, that he did not deem it criminal; whence, no less than from the words of the Epistle, it is clear that the offence of the Judaizing Christians whom he condemned was what we have stated; that their crime did not consist in their obstinately continuing to adhere to a dispensation, the ceremonial of which Christianity had abrogated, nor yet that it arose out of the sacrifices of the Levitical law being from their very nature without efficacy for the blotting out of sin: See Hebrews x, 4, &c.—It was not that the foundation on which they built was of a sandy nature, but that they built on any other foundation than that which God had laid in the gospel; it was not that they fixed their confidence on a false or a defective object, but that they did not direct it exclusively to the only true object of hope held forth to us by the gospel.

to it, as to the only source of consolation. “Other foundation can no man lay;” there is no other ground for dependence, no other plea for pardon; but here there is hope, even to the uttermost. Let us labour then to affect our hearts with a deep conviction of our need of a Redeemer, and of the value of his offered mediation. Let us fall down humbly before the throne of God, imploring pity and pardon in the name of the Son of his love. Let us beseech him to give us a true spirit of repentance, and of hearty undivided faith in the Lord Jesus. Let us not be satisfied till the cordiality of our belief be confirmed to us by that character with which we are furnished by an inspired writer, “that to as many as believe, Christ is precious; and let us strive to increase daily in love towards our blessed Saviour; and pray earnestly that “we may be filled with joy and peace in believing, that we may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost.” Let us diligently put in practice the directions already given for cherishing and cultivating the principle of the love of Christ. With this view let us labour assiduously to increase in knowledge, that our affection to the Lord who bought us may be deeply rooted and rational. By frequent meditation on the incidents of our Saviour’s life, and still more on the astonishing circumstances of his death—by often calling to mind the state from which he proposes to rescue us, and the glories of his heavenly kingdom—by continual intercourse with him of prayer and praise, of dependence and confidence in dangers, of hope and joy in our brighter hours—let us endeavour to keep him constantly present to our minds, and to render all our conceptions of him more distinct, lively, and intelligent. The title of Christian is a reproach to us, if we estrange ourselves from him after whom we are denominated. The name of Jesus is not to be to us like the Allah of the Mahometans, a talisman or an amulet, to be worn on the arm, merely as an external badge and symbol of our profession, and to preserve us from evil by some mysterious and unintelligible potency; but it is to be engraven deeply on the heart, there written by the finger of God himself in everlasting characters. It is our sure and undoubted title to present peace and future glory. The assurance which this title conveys of a bright reversion, will lighten the burdens, and alleviate the sorrows of life; and, in some happier moments, it will impart to us somewhat of that fulness of joy which is at God's right hand, enabling us to join even here in the heavenly hosannah: "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power and riches and wisdom and strength and honour and glory and blessing."—"Blessing and honour and glory and power be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever."

CHAPTER IV.

ON THE PREVAILING INADEQUATE CONCEPTIONS CONCERNING THE NATURE AND THE STRICT-NESS OF PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY.

SECT. I.

ONE part of the foregoing title may perhaps, on the first view, excite some surprise in such of my readers as may have drawn a hasty inference from the charges conveyed by the two preceding chapters. It might perhaps be expected, that they who have very low conceptions of the corruption of human nature, would be proportionably less indulgent to human frailty; and that they who lay little stress on Christ's satisfaction for sin, or on the operations of the Holy Spirit, would be more high and rigid in their demands of diligent endeavours after universal holiness; since their scheme implies, that we must depend chiefly on our own exertions and performances for our acceptance with God.

But any such expectations as these would be greatly disappointed. There is, in fact, a region of truth and a region of errors. They who hold the fundamental doctrines of Scripture in their due force, hold also in its due degree of purity the practical system which Scripture inculcates. But they who explain away the former, soften down the latter also, and reduce it to the level of their own defective scheme. It is not from any confidence in the superior amount of their own performances, or in the greater vigour of their own exertions, that they reconcile themselves to their low views of that satisfaction of Christ, and of the holiness of the Spirit; but it rather seems to be their plan so to depress the required standard of practice, that no man need fall short of it, and that no superior aid can be wanted for enabling us to attain to it. It happens, however, with respect to their simple method of morality, as in the case of the short ways to knowledge, of which some vain pretenders have vaunted themselves to be possessed : despising the beaten track in which more sober and humble spirits have been content to tread, they have indignantly struck into new and untried paths ; but these have failed of conducting them to the right object, and have issued only in ignorance and conceit.

It seems in our days to be the commonly received opinion, that provided a man admit in general terms the truth of Christianity, though he neither know nor consider much concerning the particulars of the system, and if he be not habitually guilty of any of the grosser vices against his fellow-creatures, we have no great reason to be dissatisfied with him, or to question the validity of his claim to the name and privileges of a Christian. The title implies no more than a sort of formal, general assent to Christianity in the gross, and a degree of morality in practice, little if at all superior to that for which we look in a good Deist, Mussulman, or Hindoo.

Should any be disposed to deny that this is a fair representation of the religion of the bulk of the Christian world, they might be asked, Whether, if it were proved to them beyond dispute, that Christianity is a mere forgery, this would occasion any great change in their conduct or habits of mind ? Would any alteration be made in consequence of this discovery, except in a few of their speculative opinions, which, when distinct from practice, it is a part of their own system to think of little consequence, and, with regard to public worship, (knowing the good effects of religion upon the lower orders of the people,) they might still think it better to attend occasionally for example' sake ? Would not a regard for their charafter, their health, their domestic and social comforts, still continue to restrain them from vicious excesses, and prompt them to persist in the discharge, according to their present measure, of the various duties of their stations? Would they find themselves dispossessed of what had been to them hitherto the repository of counsel and instruction, the rule of their conduct, the source of their peace and hope and consolation?

It were needless to put these questions. They are answered in fact already by the lives of many known unbelievers, between whom and these professed Christians, even the familiar associates of both, though men of discernment and observation, would discover little difference either in conduct or temper of mind. How little then does Christianity deserve that title to novelty and superiority which has been almost universally admitted—that pre-eminence, as a practical code, over all other systems of ethics! How unmerited are the praises which have been lavished upon it by its friends—praises in which even its enemies (not in general disposed to make concessions in its favour) have so often been unwarily drawn in to acquiesce!

Was it then for this that the Son of God condescended to become our instructor and our pattern, leaving us an example that we might tread in his steps? Was it for this that the apostles of Christ voluntarily submitted to hunger and nakedness, and pain, and ignominy, and death, when forewarned too by their Master that such would be their treatment? That, after all, their disciples should attain to no higher a strain of virtue than those who, rejecting their divine authority, should still adhere to the old philosophy?

But it may perhaps be objected, that we are forgetting an observation which we ourselves have made, that Christianity has raised the general standard of morals; to which, therefore, Infidelity herself now finds it prudent to conform, availing herself of the pure morality of Christianity, and sometimes wishing to usurp to herself the credit of it, while she stigmatizes the authors with the epithets of ignorant dupes or designing impostors.

But let it be asked, are the motives of Christianity so little necessary to the practice of it, its principles to its conclusions, that the one may be spared, and yet the other remain in undiminished force? If so, its doctrines are no more than a barren and inapplicable, or at least an unnecessary theory; the place of which, it may perhaps be added, would be well supplied by a more simple and less costly scheme.

But can it be? Is Christianity then reduced to a mere creed? Is its practical influence bounded within a few external plausibilities? Does its essence consist only in a few speculative opinions, and a few useless and unprofitable tenets? And can this be the ground of that portentous distinction, which is so unequivocally made by the evangelist between those who accept and those who reject the gospel—"He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him?" This were to run into the very error which the bulk of professed Christians would be most forward to condemn, of making an unproductive faith the rule of God's future judgment, and the ground of an eternal separation. Thus, not unlike the rival circumnavigators from Spain and Portugal, who, setting out in contrary directions, found themselves in company at the very time they thought themselves farthest from each other; so the bulk of professed Christians arrive, though by a different course, almost at the very same point, and occupy nearly the same station as a set of enthusiasts, who also rest upon a barren faith, to whom, on the first view, they might be thought the most nearly opposite, and whose tenets they with reason profess to hold in peculiar detestation. By what pernicious courtesy of language is it, that this wretched system has been flattered with the name of Christianity?

The morality of the gospel is not so slight a fabric. Christianity, throughout the whole extent, exhibits proofs of its divine original, and its practical precepts are no less pure than its doctrines are sublime. Can the compass of language furnish injunctions stricter in their measure, or larger in their comprehension, than those with which the word of God abounds?—"Whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus."—"Be ye holy, for God is holy."—"Be ye perfect, as your Father who is in heaven is perfect." We are commanded to "perfect holiness;" to "go on unto perfection."

Such are the Scripture admonitions; and surely they to whom such admonitions are addressed may not safely acquiesce in low attainments. This is a conclusion to which we are led, as well by the force of the expressions by which Christians are characterized in Scripture, as by the radical change which is represented as taking place in every man on his becoming a real Christian. “Every one,” it is said, “that hath this hope, purifieth himself even as God is pure:” true Christians are said to be “partakers of the divine nature;”—to be “created anew in the image of God;”—to be “temples of the Holy Ghost.” The effects of which must appear “in all goodness and righteousness and truth.”

Great as was the progress which the apostle Paul had made in all virtue, he declares of himself that he still presses forward, “forgetting the things which are behind, and reaching forth unto the things which are before.” He prays for his beloved converts, “that they may be filled with all the fulness of God;” “that they may be filled with the fruits of righteousness;” “that they might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work.” And from one of the petitions, which our blessed Saviour inserts in that form of prayer which he has given as a model for our imitation, we may infer, that the habitual sentiment of our hearts ought to be, “Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven.”

These few extracts from the word of God will serve abundantly to evince the strictness of the Christian morality; but this point will be still more fully established, when we proceed to investigate the ruling principles of the Christian character.

I apprehend the essential practical characteristic of true Christians to be this: that, relying on the promises to repenting sinners of acceptance through the Redeemer, they have renounced and abjured all other masters, and have cordially and unreservedly devoted themselves to God. This is indeed the very figure which baptism daily represents to us. Like the father of Hannibal, we there bring our infant to the altar, we consecrate him to the service of his proper owner, and vow in his name eternal hostilities against all the enemies of his salvation. After the same manner, Christians are become the sworn enemies of sin: they will henceforth hold no parley with it, they will allow it no shape, they will admit it to no composition; the war which they have denounced against it is cordial, universal, irreconcilable.

But this is not all.—It is now their determined purpose to yield themselves, without reserve, to the reasonable service of their rightful Sovereign. “They are not their own;” their bodily and mental faculties, their natural and acquired endowments, their substance, their authority, their time, their influence—all these they consider as belonging to them, not for their own gratification, but as so many instruments to be consecrated to the honour of God, and employed in his service. This is the master principle to which every other must be subordinate. Whatever may have been hitherto their ruling passion, whatever hitherto their leading pursuit—whether sensual or intellectual, whether of science, of taste, of fancy, or of feeling—it must now possess but a secondary place; or rather (to speak more correctly) it must exist only at the pleasure of its true and legitimate superior, and be put altogether under its direction and control.

Thus it is the prerogative of Christianity “to bring into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ." They who really feel its power are resolved "to live no longer to themselves, but to Him that died for them:" they know, indeed, their own infirmities; they know, that the way on which they have entered is strait and difficult, but they know too the encouraging assurance—"They who wait on the Lord shall renew their strength;" and relying on this animating declaration, they deliberately purpose that, so far as they may be able, the grand governing maxim of their future lives shall be "to do all to the glory of God."

Behold here the seminal principle, which contains within it, as in an embryo state, the rudiments of all true virtue; which, striking deep its roots, though feeble perhaps and lowly in its beginnings, yet silently progressive, and almost insensibly maturing, will shortly, even in the bleak and churlish temperatures of this world, lift up its head and spread abroad its branches, bearing abundant fruits—precious fruits of refreshment and consolation, of which the boasted products of philosophy are but sickly imitations, void of fragrance and of flavour. But,

Igneus est ollis vigor et cœlestis origo.

At length it shall be transplanted into its native region, and enjoy a more genial climate, and a kindlier soil; and, bursting forth into full luxuriance, with unfading beauty and unexhausted odours, shall flourish for ever in the paradise of God.

But while the servants of Christ continue in this life, glorious as is the issue of their labours, they receive but too many humiliating memorials of their remaining imperfections, and they daily find reason to confess that they cannot do the things that they would. Their determination, however, is still unshaken, and it is the fixed desire of their hearts to improve in all holiness,—and this, let it be observed, on many accounts. Various passions concur to push them forward; they are urged on by the dread of failure in this arduous but necessary work; they trust not, where their all is at stake, to lively emotions, or to internal impressions, however warm; the example of Christ is their pattern; the word of God is their rule; there they read, that “without holiness no man shall see the Lord.” It is the description of real Christians, that “they are gradually changed into the image of their divine Master;” and they dare not allow themselves to believe their title sure, except so far as they can discern in themselves the growing traces of this blessed resemblance.

It is not merely however by the fear of misery, and the desire of happiness, that they are actuated in their endeavours to excel in all holiness; they love it for its own sake: nor is it solely by the sense of self-interest (a principle, it must be confessed, of an inferior order, though often unreasonably condemned) that they are influensed in their determination to obey the will of God, and to cultivate his favour. This determination has its foundations indeed in a deep and humiliating sense of his exalted majesty and infinite power, and of their own extreme inferiority and littleness, attended with a settled conviction of its being their duty, as his creatures, to submit in all things to the will of their great Creator. But these awful impressions are relieved and ennobled by an admiring sense of the infinite perfections and infinite amiableness of the divine character; animated by a confiding though humble hope of his fatherly kindness and protection, and quickened by the grateful recollection of immense and continually increasing obligations. This is the Christian love of God!—a love compounded of admiration, of preference, of hope, of trust, of joy—chastised by reverential awe, and wakeful with continual gratitude.

I would here express myself with caution, lest I should inadvertently wound the heart of some weak but sincere believer. The elementary principles which have been above enumerated may exist in various degrees and proportions. A difference in natural disposition, in the circumstances of the past life, and in numberless other particulars, may occasion a great difference in the predominant tempers of different Christians. In one the love, in another the fear of God, may have the ascendancy; trust in one, and in another gratitude; but, in greater or less degrees, a cordial complacency in the sovereignty of the divine Being, an exalted sense of his perfections, a grateful impression of his goodness, and an humble hope of his favour, are common to them all. Common—the determination to devote themselves, without exceptions, to the service and glory of God. Common—the desire of holiness and of continual progress towards perfection. Common—an abasing consciousness of their own unworthiness, and of their many remaining infirmities, which interpose so often to corrupt the simplicity of their intentions, to thwart the execution of their purer purposes, and frustrate the resolutions of their better hours.

But some, perhaps, who will not directly oppose the conclusions for which we have been contending may endeavour to elude them. It may be urged, that to represent them as of general application, is going much too far; and, however true in the case of some individuals of a higher order, it may be asserted they are not applicable to ordinary Christians; from these so much will not surely be expected; and here perhaps there may be a secret reference to that supposed mitigation of the requisitions of the divine law under the Christian dispensation, which we have already noticed as being too prevalent among professing Christians. This is so important a point, that it ought not to be passed over: let us call in the authority of Scripture—where the difficulty is not to find proofs, but to select with discretion from the multitude which pour in upon us. Here also, as in former instances, the positive injunctions of Scripture are confirmed and illustrated by various considerations and inferences, suggested by other parts of the sacred writings, all tending to the same infallible conclusion.

In the first place, the precepts are expressed in the most general terms: there is no hint given, that any persons are at liberty to conceive themselves exempted from the obligation of them; and in any who are disposed to urge such a plea of exemption, it may well excite the most serious apprehension to consider how the plea would be received by an earthly tribunal. No weak argument this to such as are acquainted with the Scriptures, and who know how often God is there represented as reasoning with mankind on the principles which they have established for their dealings with each other.

But, in the next place, the precepts of the gospel contain within themselves abundant proofs of their universal application, inasmuch as they are grounded on circumstances and relations common to all Christians, and of the benefits of which, even our objectors themselves (though they would evade the practical deductions from them) would not be willing to relinquish their share. Christians “are not their own,” because “they are bought with a price;” they are not “to live unto themselves, but to Him that died for them;” they are commanded to do the most difficult duties, “that they may be the children of their Father which is in heaven;” and “except a man be born again, of the Spirit,” (thus again becoming one of the sons of God,) “he cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven.” It is “because they are sons” that God has given them what in Scripture language is styled “the Spirit of adoption.” It is only of “as many as are led by the Spirit of God” that it is declared, that “they are the sons of God;” and we are expressly warned, (in order as it were to prevent any such loose profession of Christianity as that which we are here combating,) “If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.” In short, Christians in general are everywhere denominated the servants and the children of God, and are required to serve him with that submissive obedience, and that affectionate promptitude, which belong to those endearing relations.

Estimate next the force of that well known passage—“Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength.” The injunction is multiplied on us, as it were, to silence the sophistry of the caviller, and to fix the most inconsiderate mind. And though, for the sake of argument, we should concede for the present, that, under the qualifications formerly suggested, an ardent and vigorous affection were not indispensably required of us—yet surely if the words have any meaning at all, the least which can be intended by them is that settled predominant esteem and cordial preference for which we are now contending. The conclusion which this passage forces on us is strikingly confirmed by other parts of Scripture, wherein the love of God is positively commended to the whole of a Christian church;* or wherein the want of it,† or wherein its not being the chief and ruling affection, is charged on persons professing themselves Christians, as being sufficient to disprove their claim to that appellation, or as being equivalent to denying it.‡ Let not, therefore, any deceive themselves by imagining, that only an absolute unqualified renunciation of the desire of the favour of God is here condemned. God will not accept of a divided affection; a single heart, and a single eye, are in express terms declared to be indispensably required of us. We are ordered, under the figure of amassing heavenly treasure, to make the favour and service of God our chief pursuit, for this very reason, because “where our treasure is, there will our hearts be also.” It is on this principle that, in speaking of particular vices, such phrases are often used in Scripture as suggest that their criminality mainly consists in drawing away the heart from Him who is the just object of its preference; and that sins, which we might think very different in criminality, are classed together, because they all agree in this grand character. Nor is this preference asserted only over affections which are vicious in themselves, and to which therefore Christianity might well be supposed hostile, but over those also which, in their just measure, are not only lawful, but even most strongly enjoined on us. “He that loveth father or mother more than me,” says our blessed Saviour, “is not worthy of me;” “and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me.” The spirit of these injunctions harmonizes with many commendations in Scripture, of zeal for the honour of God; as well as with that strong expression of disgust and abhorrence with which the lukewarm, those that are neither cold nor hot, are spoken of as being more loathsome and offensive than even open and avowed enemies.

* 2 Cor. xiii, 14.

† 1 John iii, 17.—Rom. xvi. 18.—Compared with Phil. iii, 19; also 1 Cor. xvi, 22.

‡ 2 Timothy iii, 4.

Another class of instances, tending to the same point, is furnished by those many passages of Scripture wherein the promoting of the glory of God is commanded as our supreme and universal aim, and wherein the honour due unto him is declared to be that in which he will allow no competitor to participate. On this head, indeed, the Holy Scriptures are, if possible, more peremptory than on the former; and at the same time so full as to render particular citations unnecessary to those who have ever so little acquaintance with the word of God.

To put the same thing therefore in another light. All who have read the Scriptures must confess, that idolatry is the crime against which God's highest resentment is expressed, and his severest punishment denounced. But let us not deceive ourselves. It is not in bowing the knee to idols that idolatry consists, so much as in the internal homage of the heart—as in feeling towards them any of that supreme love or reverence or gratitude which God reserves to himself as his own exclusive prerogative. On the same principle, whatever else draws off the heart from him, engrosses our prime regard, and holds the chief place in our esteem and affections, that, in the estimation of reason, is no less an idol to us, than an image of wood or stone would be, before which we should fall down and worship. Think not this a strained analogy; it is the very language and argument of inspiration. The servant of God is commanded not to set up his idol in his heart; and sensuality and covetousness are repeatedly termed idolatry. The same God who declares—"My glory will I not give to another, neither my praise to graven images," declares also—"Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might; let not the rich man glory in his riches." "No flesh may glory in his presence." "He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." The sudden vengeance by which the vainglorious ostentation of Herod was punished, when, acquiescing in the servile adulation of an admiring multitude, "he gave not God the glory," is a dreadful comment on these injunctions.

These awful declarations, it is to be feared, are little regarded. Let the great, and the wise, and the learned, and the successful, lay them seriously to heart, and labour habitually to consider their superiority, whether derived from nature, or study, or fortune, as the unmerited bounty of God. This reflection will naturally tend to produce a disposition, in all respects the opposite to that proud self-complacency so apt to grow upon the human heart—a disposition honourable to God and useful to man; a temper composed of reverence, humility, and gratitude, and delighting to be engaged in the praises, and employed in the benevolent service, of the universal Benefactor.

But to return to our subject, it only remains to be remarked, that here, as in the former instances, the characters of the righteous and of the wicked, as delineated in Scripture, exactly correspond with the representations which have been given of the Scripture injunctions.

The necessity of this cordial unreserved devotedness to the glory and service of God, as being indispensable to the character of the true Christian, has been insisted on at the greater length, not only on account of its own extreme importance, but also because it appears to be a duty too generally overlooked. Once well established, it will serve as a fundamental principle both for the government of the heart and regulation of the conduct, and will prove eminently useful in the decision of many practical cases, which it might be difficult to bring under the undisputed operation of any subordinate or appropriate rule.

SECT. II.

And now, having endeavoured to establish the strictness, and to ascertain the essential character of true practical Christianity, let us investigate a little more in detail the practical system of the bulk of professed Christians among ourselves.*

It was formerly remarked, that the whole subject of religion was often viewed from such a distance as to be seen only in the gross. We now, it is to be feared, shall find too much cause for believing, that they who approach a little nearer, and do discover in Christianity somewhat of a distinct form, yet come not close enough to discern her peculiar lineaments and conformation. The writer must not be understood to mean, that the several misconceptions, which he shall have occasion to point out, will be generally found to exist with anything like precision, much less that they are regularly digested into a system; nor will it be expected they all should meet in the same person, nor that they will not be found in different people, and under different circumstances, variously blended, combined, and modified. It will be enough if we succeed in tracing out great and general outlines. The human countenance may be well described by its general characters, though infinitely varied by the peculiarities which belong to different individuals, and often by such shades and minutenesses of difference, as though abundantly obvious to our perceptions, yet would exceed the power of definition to discriminate, or even of language to express.

* It will be remembered by the reader, that it is not the object of this work to animadvert on the vices, defects, and erroneous opinions of the times, except so far as they are received into the prevailing religious system, or are tolerated by it, and are not thought sufficient to prevent a man from being esteemed on the whole a very tolerable Christian.

A very erroneous notion appears to prevail concerning the true nature of religion. Religion, agreeably to what has been already stated, (the importance of the subject will excuse repetition,) may be considered as the implantation of a vigorous and active principle ; it is seated in the heart, where its authority is recognised as supreme, whence by degrees it expels whatever is opposed to it, and where it gradually brings all the affections and desires under its complete control and regulation.

But, though the heart be its special residence, it may be said to possess, in a degree, the ubiquity of its divine Author. Every endeavour and pursuit must acknowledge its presence; and whatever receives not its sacred stamp, is to be condemned as inherently defective, and is to be at once relinquished. It is like the principle of vitality, which, animating every part, lives throughout the whole of the human body, and communicates its kindly influence to the smallest and remotest fibres of the frame. But the notion of religion entertained by many among us seems altogether different. They begin, indeed, in submission to her clear prohibitions, by fencing off, from the field of human action, a certain district, which, though it in many parts bears fruit on which they cast a longing eye, they cannot but confess to be forbidden ground. They next assign to religion a portion, larger or smaller, according to whatever may be their circumstances and views, in which however she is to possess merely a qualified jurisdiction ; and having so done, they conceive that without let or hinderance they have a right to range at will over the spacious remainder. Religion can claim only a stated proportion of their thoughts, their time, their fortune, and influence; and of these, or perhaps of any of them, if they make her anything of a liberal allowance, she may well be satisfied; the rest is now their own to do what they will with; they have paid their tithes, say rather their composition, the demands of the church are satisfied, and they may surely be permitted to enjoy what she has left without molestation or interference.

It is scarcely possible to state too strongly the mischief which results from this fundamental error. At the same time, its consequences are so natural and obvious, that one would think it scarcely possible not to foresee that they must infallibly follow. The greatest part of human actions is considered as indifferent. If men are not chargeable with actual vices, and are decent in the discharge of their religious duties—if they do not stray into the forbidden ground, if they respect the rights of the conceded allotment, what more can be expected from them? Instead of keeping at a distance from all sin, in which alone consists our safety, they will be apt not to care how near they approach what they conceive to be the boundary line; if they have not actually passed it, there is no harm done, it is no trespass. Thus the free and active spirit of religion is “cribbed and hemmed in;” she is checked in her disposition to expand her territory, and enlarge the circle of her influence. She must keep to her prescribed confines, and every attempt to extend them will be resisted as an encroachment.

But this is not all. Since whatever can be gained from her allotment, or whatever can be taken in from the forbidden ground, will be so much of addition to that land of liberty, where men may roam at large, free from restraint or molestation, they will of course be constantly, and almost insensibly, straitening and pressing upon the limits of the religious allotment on the one hand ; and, on the other, will be removing back a little farther and farther the fence which abridges them on the side of the forbidden ground, If religion attempt for a time to defend her frontier. she by degrees gives way. The space she occupies diminishes till it be scarcely discernible ; whilst, her spirit extinguished, and her force destroyed, she is little more than the nominal possessor, even of the contracted limits to which she has been avowedly reduced.

This, it is to be feared, is but too faithful a representation of the general state of things among ourselves. The promotion of the glory of God, and the possession of his favour, are no longer recognised as the objects of our highest regard, and most strenuous endeavours ; as furnishing to us a vigorous, habitual, and universal principle of action. We set up for ourselves : we are become our own masters. The sense of constant homage and continual service is irksome and galling to us ; and we rejoice in being emancipated from it, as from a state of base and servile villanage. Thus the very tenor and condition by which life and all its possessions are held undergo a total change : our faculties and powers are now our own : whatever we have is regarded rather as a property than as a trust ; or, if there still exist the remembrance of some paramount claim, we are satisfied with an occasional acknowledgment of a nominal right; we pay our peppercorn, and take our estates to ourselves in full and free enjoyment.

Hence it is that so little sense of responsibility seems attached to the possession of high rank, or splendid abilities, or affluent fortunes, or other means or instruments of usefulness. The instructive admonitions, "Give an account of thy stewardship,"—"Occupy till I come," are forgotten. Or if it be acknowledged by some men of larger views than ordinary, that a reverence is to be had to some principle superior to that of our own gratification, it is, at best, to the good of society, or to the welfare of our families; and even then the obligations resulting from these relations are seldom enforced on us by any higher sanctions than those of family comfort, and of worldly interest or estimation. Besides, what multitudes of persons are there, people without families, in private stations, or of a retired turn, to whom they are scarcely held to apply! and what multitudes of cases to which it would be thought unnecessary scrupulosity to extend them! Accordingly we find, in fact, that the generality of mankind among the higher order, in the formation of their schemes, in the selection of their studies, in the choice of their place of residence, in the employment and distribution of their time, in their thoughts, conversation, and amusements, are considered as being at liberty, if there be no actual vice, to consult in the main their own gratification.

Thus the generous and wakeful spirit of Christian benevolence, seeking and finding everywhere occasions for its exercise, is exploded, and a system of decent selfishness is avowedly established in its stead: a system scarcely more to be abjured for its impiety, than to be abhorred for its cold insensibility to the opportunities of diffusing happiness. “Have we no families, or are they provided for,—are we wealthy, and bred to no profession,—are we young and lively, and in the gayety and vigour of youth,—surely we may be allowed to take our pleasure. We neglect no duty, we live in no vice, we do nobody any harm, and have a right to amuse ourselves. We have nothing better to do; we wish we had: our time hangs heavy on our hands for want of it.”

I pity the man who can travel from Dan to Beersheba, and cry, “It is all barren.” No man has a right to be idle.—Not to speak of that great work which we all have to accomplish, (and surely the whole attention of a short and precarious life is not more than an eternal interest may well require,) where is it that, in such a world as this, health and leisure and affluence may not find some ignorance to instruct, some wrong to redress, some want to supply, some misery to alleviate? Shall ambition and avarice never sleep,—shall they never want objects on which to fasten,—shall they be so observant to discover, so acute to discern, so eager, so patient to pursue—and shall the benevolence of Christians want employment?

Yet thus life rolls away with too many of us in a course of “shapeless idleness.” Its recreations constitute its chief business. Watering places—the sports of the field—cards! never-failing cards!—the assembly—the theatre—all contribute their aid;—

amusements are multiplied, and combined, and varied, “to fill up the void of a listless and languid life;” and, by the judicious use of these different resources, there is often a kind of sober settled plan of domestic dissipation, in which, with all imaginable decency, year after year wears away in unprofitable vacancy. Even old age often finds us pacing in the same round of amusements which our early youth had tracked out. Meanwhile, being conscious that we are not giving in to any flagrant vice, perhaps that we are guilty of no irregularity, and, it may be, that we are not neglecting the office of religion, we persuade ourselves that we need not be uneasy. In the main we do not fall below the general standard of morals, of the class and station to which we belong: we may therefore allow ourselves to glide down the stream without apprehension of the consequences.

Some, of a character often hardly to be distinguished from the class we have been just describing, take up with sensual pleasures. The chief happiness of their lives consists in one species or another of animal gratification; and these persons perhaps will be found to compose a pretty large description. It will be remembered, that it belongs not to our purpose to speak of the grossly and scandalously profligate, who renounce all pretensions to the name of Christians; but of those who, maintaining a certain decency of character, and perhaps being tolerably observant of the forms of religion, may yet be not improperly termed sober sensualists. These, though less impetuous and more measured, are not less staunch and steady than the professed votaries of licentious pleasure, in the pursuit of their favourite objects. “Mortify the flesh, with its affections and lusts,” is the Christian precept; a soft luxurious course of habitual indulgence is the practice of the bulk of modern Christians: and that constant moderation, that wholesome discipline of restraint and self-denial, which are requisite to prevent the unperceived encroachments of the inferior appetities, seem altogether disused, as the exploded austerities of monkish superstition.

Christianity calls her professors to a state of diligent watchfulness and active services. But the persons of whom we are now speaking, forgetting alike the duties they owe to themselves and to their fellow-creatures, often act as though their condition were meant to be a state of uniform indulgence, and vacant, unprofitable sloth. To multiply the comforts of affluence, to provide for the gratification of appetite, to be luxurious without diseases, and indolent without lassitude, seems the chief study of their lives. Nor can they be clearly exempted from this class, who, by a common error, substituting the means for the end, make the preservation of health and spirits, not as instruments of usefulness, but as sources of pleasure, their great business and continual care.

Others, again, seem more to attach themselves to what have been well termed the “pomp and vanities of this world.” Magnificent houses, grand equipages, numerous retinues, splendid entertainments, high and fashionable connections, appear to constitute, in their estimation, the supreme happiness of life. This class too, if we mistake not, will be found numerous in our days; for it must be considered, that it is the heart set on these things which constitutes the essential character. It often happens, that persons, to whose rank and station these indulgences most properly belong, are most indifferent to them. The undue solicitude about them is more visible in persons of inferior conditions and smaller fortunes, in whom it is not rarely detected by the studious contrivances of a misapplied ingenuity to reconcile parade with economy, and to glitter at a cheap rate. But this temper of display and competition is a direct contrast to the lowly, modest, unassuming carriage of the true Christian: and, wherever there is an evident effort and struggle to excel in the particulars here in question, a manifest wish thus to rival superiors, to outstrip equals, to dazzle inferiors, it is manifest, the great end of life, and of all its possessions, is too little kept in view; and it is to be feared, that the gratification of a vain ostentatious humour is the predominant disposition of the heart.

As there is a sober sensuality, so is there also a sober avarice, and a sober ambition. The commercial and the professional world compose the chief sphere of their influence. They are often recognised and openly avowed as just master-principles of action. But where this is not the case, they assume such plausible shapes, are called by such specious names, and urge such powerful pleas, that they are received with cordiality, and suffered to gather strength without suspicion. The seducing considerations of diligence in our callings, of success in our profession, of making handsome provisions for our children, beguile our better judgments. “We rise early, and late take rest, and eat the bread of carefulness." In our few intervals of leisure, our exhausted spirits require refreshment; the serious concerns of our immortal souls are matters of speculation too grave and gloomy to answer the purpose; and we fly to something that may better deserve the name of relaxation, till we are again summoned to the daily labours of our employment.

Meanwhile religion seldom comes in our way, scarcely occurs to our thoughts; and when some secret misgivings begin to be felt on this head, company soon drowns, amusements dissipate, or habitual occupations insensibly displace or smother, the rising apprehension. Professional and commercial men, perhaps, especially when they happen to be persons of more than ordinary reflection, or of early habits of piety not quite worn away, easily quiet their consciences by the plea, that necessary attention to their business leaves them no time to think on these serious subjects at present. "Men of leisure, they confess, should consider them; they themselves will do it hereafter when they retire; meanwhile they are usefully, or at least innocently employed." Thus business and pleasure fill up our time, and the "one thing needful" is forgotten. Respected by others, and secretly applauding ourselves, (perhaps congratulating ourselves that we are not like such a one who is a spendthrift, or a mere man of pleasure, or such another who is a notorious miser,) the true principle of action is no less wanting in us; and personal advancement, or the acquisition of wealth, is the object of our supreme desires and predominant pursuit.

It would be to presume too much on the reader's patience to attempt a delineation of the characters of the politician, the metaphysician, the scholar, the poet, the virtuoso, the man of taste, in all their varieties. Of these, and many other classes which might be enumerated, suffice it to remark, and to appeal to every man's own experience for the truth of the observation, that they in like manner are often completely engrossed by the objects of their several pursuits. In many of these cases, indeed, a generous spirit surrenders itself wholly up with the less reserve, and continues absorbed with the fuller confidence, from the consciousness of not being led to its object by self-interested motives. Here therefore these men are ardent, active, laborious, persevering; and they think and speak and act as those whose happiness wholly turns on the success or failure of their endeavours. When such is the undisturbed composure of mere triflers, it is less wonderful that the votaries of learning and of taste, when absorbed in their several pursuits, should be able to check still more easily any growing apprehension, silencing it by the suggestion, that they are more than harmlessly, that they are meritoriously employed. "Surely the thanks of mankind are justly paid to those more refined spirits, who, superior alike to the seductions of ease, and the temptations of avarice, devote their time and talents to the less gainful labours of increasing the stores of learning, or enlarging the boundaries of science; who are engaged in raising the character and condition of society, by improving the liberal arts, and adding to the innocent pleasures or elegant accomplishments of life." Let not the writer be so far misunderstood, as to be supposed to insinuate.

that religion is an enemy to the pursuits of taste, much less to those of learning and of science. Let these have their due place in the estimation of mankind: but this must not be the highest place. Let them know their just subordination. They deserve not to be the primary concern; for there is another, to which in importance they bear no more proportion than our span of existence to eternity.

Thus the centre to which the chief desires of the heart should tend, losing its attractive force, our affections are permitted without control to take that course, whatever it may be, which best suits our natural temper, or to which they are impelled by our various situations and circumstances. Sometimes they manifestly appear to be almost entirely confined to a single track; but perhaps more frequently the lines in which they move are so intermingled and diversified, that it becomes not a little difficult, even when we look into ourselves, to ascertain the object by which they are chiefly attracted, or to estimate with precision the amount of their several forces, in the different directions in which they move. "Know thyself," is in truth an injunction with which the careless and the indolent cannot comply. For this compliance, it is requisite, in obedience to the scripture precept, "to keep the heart with all diligence." Mankind are, in general, deplorably ignorant of their true state; and there are few perhaps who have any adequate conception of the real strength of the ties by which they are bound to the several objects of their attachment, or who are aware how small a share of their regard is possessed by those concerns on which it ought to be supremely fixed.

But if it be indeed true, that, except the affections of the soul be supremely fixed on God, and unless our leading and governing desire and primary pursuit be to possess his favour and promote his glory, we are considered as having transferred our fealty to a usurper, and as being in fact revolvers from our lawful Sovereign. If this be indeed the Scripture doctrine, all the several attachments which have been lately enumerated, of the different classes of society, wherever they interest the affections, and possess the soul in any such measure of strength as deserves to be called predominance, are but so many varied expressions of disloyalty. God requires to set up his throne in the heart, and to reign in it, without a rival: if he be kept out of his right, it matters not by what competitor. The revolt may be more avowed or more secret: it may be the treason of deliberate preference, or of inconsiderate levity; we may be the subjects of a master more or less creditable; we may be employed in services more gross or more refined; but whether the slaves of avarice, of sensuality, of dissipation, of sloth, or the votaries of ambition, of taste, or of fashion—whether supremely governed by vanity and self-love, by the desire of literary fame or of military glory—we are alike estranged from the dominion of our rightful Sovereign. Let not this seem a harsh position; it can appear so only from not adverting to what was shown to be the essential nature of true religion. He who bowed the knee to the god of medicine or of eloquence was no less an idolater than the worshipper of the deified patrons of lewdness or of theft. In the several cases which have been specified, the external acts indeed are different, but in principle the disaffection is the same ; and, unless we return to our allegiance, we must expect the title, and prepare to meet the punishment, of rebels, on that tremendous day, when all false colours shall be done away, and (there being no longer any room for the evasions of worldly sophistry, or the smooth plausibilities of worldly language) “that which is often highly esteemed amongst men shall appear to have been abomination in the sight of God.”

These fundamental truths seem vanished from the mind, and it follows of course that every thing is viewed less and less through a religious medium. To speak no longer of instances wherein we ourselves are concerned, and wherein the unconquerable power of indulged appetite may be supposed to beguile our better judgment, or force us on in defiance of it—not to insist on the motives by which the conduct of men is determined, often avowedly, in what are to themselves the most important incidents of life—what are the judgments which they form in the case of others ? Idleness, profusion, thoughtlessness, and dissipation, the misapplication of time or of talents, the trifling away of life in frivolous occupations, or unprofitable studies ; all these things we may regret in those around us, in the view of their temporal effects ; but they are not considered in a religious connection, or lamented as endangering everlasting happiness. Excessive vanity and inordinate ambition are spoken of as weaknesses rather than as sins ; even covetousness itself, though a hateful passion, yet, if not extreme, scarcely presents the face of irreligion. Is some friend, or even some common acquaintance, sick, or has some accident befallen him—how solicitously do we enquire after him; how tenderly do we visit him; how much perhaps do we regret that he has not better advice; how apt are we to prescribe for him; and how should we reproach ourselves if we were to neglect any means in our power of contributing to his recovery! But “the mind diseased” is neglected and forgotten—“that is not our affair; we hope (we do not perhaps really believe) that here it is well with him.” The truth is, we have no solicitude about his spiritual interest. Here he is treated like the unfortunate traveler in the gospel: we look upon him; we see but too well his sad condition, but (Priest and Levite alike) we pass by on the other side, and leave him to the officious tenderness of some poor despised Samaritan.

Nay, take the case of our very children, when our hearts being most interested to promote their happiness, we must be supposed most desirous of determining on right principles, and where therefore the real standard of our deliberate judgments may be indisputably ascertained: in their education and marriage, in the choice of their professions, in our comparative consideration and judgment of the different parts of their several characters, how little do we reflect that they are immortal beings! Health, learning, credit, the amiable and agreeable qualities, above all, fortune and success in life, are taken, and not unjustly taken, into the account: but how small a share in forming our opinions is allowed to the probable effect which may be produced on their eternal interests! Indeed the subjects of our mutual inquiries and congratulations and condolences prove but too plainly what considerations are in these cases uppermost in our thoughts.

Such are the fatal and widely-spreading effects which but too naturally follow from the admission of the grand fundamental error before mentioned, that of not considering religion as a principle of universal application and command. Robbed of its best energies, religion now takes the form of a cold compilation of restraints and prohibitions. It is looked upon simply as a set of penal statutes: these, though wise and reasonable, are, however, so far as they extend, abridgments of our natural liberty, and nothing which comes to us in this shape is extremely acceptable :

Atqui nolint occidere quemquam, posse volunt.

Considering, moreover, that the matter of them is not in general very palatable, and that the partiality of every man, where his own cause is in question, will be likely to make him construe them liberally in his own favour, we might beforehand have formed a tolerable judgment of the manner in which they are actually treated. Sometimes we attend to the words rather than to the spirit of Scripture injunctions, overlooking the principle they involve, which a better acquaintance with the word of God would have clearly taught us to infer from them. At others, “the spirit of an injunction is all;” and this we contrive to collect so dexterously, as thereby to relax or annul the strictness of the terms: “Whatever is not expressly forbidden cannot be very criminal; whatever is not positively enjoined cannot be indispensably necessary. If we do not offend against the laws, what more can be expected from us? The persons to whom the strict precepts of the gospel were given were in very different circumstances from those in which we are placed. The injunctions were drawn rather tighter than is quite necessary, in order to allow for a little relaxation in practice. The expressions of the sacred writers are figurative; the eastern style is confessedly hyperbolical."

By these and other such dishonest shifts, (by which however we seldom deceive ourselves, except it be in thinking that we deceive others,) the pure but strong morality of the word of God is explained away; and its too rigid canons are softened down, with as much dexterity as is exhibited by those who practise a logic of the same complexion, in order to escape from the obligations of human statutes. Like Swift's unfortunate brothers,* we are sometimes put to difficulties, but our ingenuity is little inferior to theirs. If totidem verbis† will not serve our turn, try totidem syllabis; if totidem syllabis fail, try totidem literis: then there is in our case, as well as in theirs, "an allegorical sense" to be adverted to; and if every other resource fail us, we come at last to the same conclusion as the brothers adopted, that, after all, those rigorous clauses require some allowance and a favourable interpretation, and ought to be understood "cum grano salis."

But when the law, both in its spirit and its letter, is obstinate and incorrigible, what we cannot bend to our purpose we must break—"Our sins, we hope, are of the smaller order; a little harmless gallantry, a little innocent jollity, a few foolish expletives, which we use from the mere force of habit, meaning nothing by them; a little warmth of colouring and licence of expression; a few freedoms of speech in the gayety of our hearts, which, though not perhaps strictly correct, none but the over-rigid would think of treating any otherwise than as venial infirmities, and in which very grave and religious men will often take their share, when they may throw off their state, and relax without impropriety. We serve an all-merciful Being, who knows the frailty of our nature, the number and strength of our temptations, and will not be extreme to mark what is done amiss. Even the less lenient judicatures of human institution concede somewhat to the weakness of man. It is an established maxim — ‘De minimis non curat lex.’ We hope we are not worse than the generality. All men are imperfect, We own we have our infirmities; we confess it is so; we wish we were better, and trust as we grow older we shall become so; we are ready to acknowledge that we must be indebted for our admission into a future state of happiness, not to our own merit, but to the clemency of God, and the mercy of our Redeemer.”

* See Tale of a Tub.

† Ibid.

But let not this language be mistaken for that of true Christian humiliation, of which it is the very essence to feel the burden of sin, and to long to be released from it; nor let two things be confounded, than which none can be more fundamentally different, the allowed want of universality in our determination and endeavour to obey the will of God, and that defective accomplishment of our purposes, which even the best of men will too often find reason to deplore. In the persons of whom we have been now speaking, the unconcern with which they can amuse themselves upon the borders of sin, and the easy familiarity with which they can actually dally with it in its less offensive shapes, show plainly that, distinctly from its consequences, it is by no means the object of their aversion; that there is no love of holiness as such; no endeavour to acquire it, no care to prepare the soul for the reception of this divine principle, and to expel or keep under whatever might be likely to obstruct its entrance or dispute its sovereignty.

It is indeed a most lamentable consequence of the practice of regarding religion as a compilation of statutes, and not as an internal principle, that it soon comes to be considered as being conversant about external actions rather than about habits of mind. This sentiment sometimes has even the hardiness to insinuate and maintain itself under the guise of extraordinary concern for practical religion; but it soon discovers the falsehood of this pretension, and betrays its real nature. The expedient indeed of attaining to superiority in practice, by not wasting any of the attention on the internal principles from which alone practice can flow, is about as reasonable, and will answer about as well, as the economy of the architect, who should account it mere prodigality to expend any of his materials in laying foundations, from an idea that they might be more usefully applied to the raising of the superstructure. We know what would be the fate of such an edifice.

It is indeed true, and a truth never to be forgotten, that all pretensions to internal principles of holiness are vain when they are contradicted by the conduct; but it is no less true, that the only effectual way of improving the latter is by a vigilant attention to the former. It was therefore our blessed Saviour's injunction, "Make the tree good," as the necessary means of obtaining good fruit; and the Holy Scriptures abound in admonitions, to make it our chief business to cultivate our hearts with all diligence, to examine into their state with impartiality, and watch over them with continual care. Indeed it is the heart which constitutes the man; and external actions derive their whole character and meaning from the motives and dispositions of which they are the indications. Human judicatures, it is true, are chiefly conversant about the former; but this is only because, to our limited perceptions the latter can seldom be any otherwise clearly ascertained. The real object of inquiry to human judicatures is the internal disposition: it is to this that they adapt the nature, and proportion the degree, of their punishments.

Yet, though this be a truth so obvious, so established, that to have insisted on it may seem almost needless, it is a truth of which we are apt to lose sight in the review of our religious character, and with which the habit of considering religion as consisting rather in external actions than internal principles is at direct and open war. This mode of judging may well be termed habitual; for though by some persons it is advisedly adopted, and openly avowed, yet in many cases, for want of due watchfulness, it has stolen insensibly upon the mind; it exists unsuspected, and is practised, like other habits, without consciousness or observation.

In what degree soever this pernicious principle prevails, in the same degree is the mischief it produces. The vicious affections, like noxious weeds, sprout up and increase of themselves but too naturally; while the graces of the Christian temper, (exotics in the soil of the human heart,) like the more tender productions of the vegetable world, require not only the light and breath of heaven to quicken them, but constant superintendence and assiduous care on our part also, in order to their being preserved in health and vigour. But so far from these graces being earnestly sought for, or watchfully reared, with unremitting prayers to God for his blessing, (without which all our labours must be ineffectual,) such is the result of the principle we are here condemning, that no endeavours are used for their attainment, or they are suffered to droop and die, almost without an effort to preserve them. The culture of the mind is less and less attended to, and at length perhaps is almost wholly neglected. Thus way is made for the unobstructed growth of other dispositions, which naturally overspread and quietly possess the mind: nor is their contrariety to the Christian spirit discerned; perhaps even their presence is scarcely acknowledged, except when their existence and their nature are manifested in the conduct, by marks too plain to be overlooked or mistaken.

This is a point which we will now endeavour to ascertain by an induction of particular instances.

First, then, it is the comprehensive compendium of the character of true Christians, that "they are walking by faith, and not by sight." By this description is meant, not merely that they so firmly believe in the doctrine of future rewards and punishments, as to be influenced by that persuasion to adhere in the main to the path of duty, though tempted to forsake it by present interest and present gratification, but further, that the great truths revealed in Scripture, concerning the unseen world, are the thoughts for the most part uppermost in their minds, and about which habitually their hearts are most interested. This state of mind contributes, if the expression may be allowed, to rectify the illusions of vision, to bring forward into nearer view those eternal things, which, from their remoteness, are apt to be either wholly overlooked, or to appear but faintly in the utmost bounds of the horizon; and to remove backward, and reduce to their true comparative dimensions, the objects of the present life, which are apt to fill the human eye, assuming a false magnitude from their vicinity. The true Christian knows from experience, however, that the former are apt to fade from the sight, and the latter again to swell on it. He makes it therefore his continual care to preserve those just and enlightened views, which through divine mercy he has obtained. Not that he will retire from that station in the world which Providence seems to have appointed him to fill: he will be active in the business of life, and enjoy its comforts with moderation and thankfulness; but he will not be "totus in illis," he will not give up his whole soul to them, they will be habitually subordinate in his estimation to objects of more importance. This awful truth has sunk deep into his mind, that "the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal;" and, in the tumult and bustle of life, he is sobered by the still small voice which whispers to him, that "the fashion of this world passes away." This circumstance alone, must, it is obvious, constitute a vast difference between the habitual temper of his mind, and that of the generality of nominal Christians, who are almost entirely taken up with the concerns of the present world. They know indeed that they are mortal, but they do not feel it. The truth rests in their understandings, and cannot gain admission into their hearts. This speculative persuasion is altogether different from that strong practical impression of the infinite importance of eternal things, which, attended with a proportionate sense of the shortness and uncertainty of all below, while it prompts to activity, from a conviction that “the night cometh when no man can work,” produces a certain firmness of texture, which hardens us against the buffetings of fortune, and prevents our being very deeply penetrated by the cares and interests, the good or evil, of this transitory state. Thus this just impression of the relative value of temporal and eternal things, maintains in the soul a dignified composure through all the vicissitudes of life. It quickens our diligence, yet moderates our ardour—urges us to just pursuits, yet checks any undue solicitude about the success of them, and thereby enables us, in the language of Scripture, “to use this world as not abusing it,” rendering us at once beneficial to others and comfortable to ourselves.

But this is not all. Besides the distinction between the nominal and the real Christian, which results from the impressions produced on them respectively by the eternal duration of heavenly things, there is another grounded on their nature, no less marked, nor less important. They are stated in Scripture, not only as entitling themselves to the notice of the true Christian from considerations of interest, but as approving themselves to his judgment from a conviction of their excellence, and yet further, as recommending themselves to his feelings by their being suited to the renewed dispositions of his heart. Indeed were the case otherwise,—did not their qualities correspond with his inclinations, however he might endure them on principles of duty, and be coldly conscious of their superior worth,—he could not lend himself to them with cordial complacency, much less look to them as the surest source of pleasure. But this is the light in which they are habitually regarded by the true Christian. He walks in the ways of religion, not by constraint, but willingly; they are to him not only safe, but comfortable: “ways of pleasantness, as well as of peace.” Not but that here also he is from experience aware of the necessity of constant support and continual watchfulness. Without these, his old estimate of things is apt to return on him, and the former objects of his affections to resume their influence. With earnest prayers, therefore, for the divine help, with jealous circumspection, and resolute self-denial, he guards against whatever might be likely again to darken his enlightened judgment, or to vitiate his reformed taste; thus making it his unwearied endeavour to grow in the knowledge and love of heavenly things, and to obtain a warmer admiration, and a more cordial relish, of their excellence.

That this is a just representation of the habitual judgment, and of the leading disposition, of true Christians, will be abundantly evident, if, endeavouring to form ourselves after our proper model, we consult the sacred Scriptures. But in vain are Christians there represented as having set their affections on things above, as cordially rejoicing in the service, and delighting in the worship of God. Pleasure and religion are contradictory terms with the bulk of nominal Christians. They may look back indeed on their religious offices with something of a secret satisfaction, and even feel it during the performance of them, from the idea of being engaged in the discharge of a duty; but this is altogether different from the pleasure which attends an employment in itself acceptable and grateful to us. We are not condemning a deficiency merely in the warmth and vehemence of religious affections; we are not asking whether the service and worship of God are delightful and pleasant to such persons; but, do they diffuse over the soul anything of that calm complacency, that mild and grateful composure, which bespeaks a mind in good humour with itself and all around it, and engaged in a service suited to its taste, and congenial with its feelings?

Let us appeal to that day which is especially devoted to the offices of religion. Do they joyfully avail themselves of this blessed opportunity of withdrawing from the business and cares of life; when, without being disquieted by any doubt whether they are neglecting the duties of their proper callings, they may be allowed to detach their minds from earthly things, that by a fuller knowledge of heavenly objects, and a more habitual acquaintance with them, their hope may grow more "full of immortality?" Is the day cheerfully devoted to those holy exercises for which it was appointed? Do they indeed "come into the courts of God with gladness?" And how are they employed when not engaged in the public services of the day? Are they busied in studying the word of God, in meditating on his perfections, in tracing his providential dispensations, in admiring his works, in revolving his mercies, (above all, the transcendent mercies of redeeming love,) in singing his praises, "and speaking good of his name?" Do their secret retirements witness the earnestness of their prayers and the warmth of their thanksgivings, their diligence and impartiality in the necessary work of self-examination, their mindfulness of the benevolent duty of intercession? Is the kind purpose of the institution of a Sabbath answered by them, in its being made to their servants and dependents a season of rest and comfort? Does the instruction of their families, or of the more poor and ignorant of their neighbours, possess its due share of their time? If blessed with talents or with affluence, are they sedulously employing a part of this interval of leisure in relieving the indigent, and visiting the sick, and comforting the sorrowful, in forming plans for the good of their fellow-creatures, in considering how they may promote both the temporal and spiritual benefit of their friends and acquaintance; or, if theirs be a larger sphere, in devising measures whereby, through the divine blessing, they may become the honoured instruments of the more extended diffusion of religious truth? In the hours of domestic or social intercourse, does their conversation manifest the subject of which their hearts are full? Do their language and demeanour show them to be more than commonly gentle and kind and friendly—free from rough and irritating passions?

Surely an entire day should not seem long amidst these various employments. It might well be deemed a privilege thus to spend it, in the more immediate presence of our heavenly Father, in the exercises of humble admiration and grateful homage; of the benevolent, and domestic, and social feelings, and of all the best affections of our nature, prompted by their true motives, conversant about their proper objects, and directed to their noblest end; all sorrows mitigated, all cares suspended, all fears repressed, every angry emotion softened, every envious or revengeful or malignant passion expelled; and the bosom thus quieted, purified, enlarged, ennobled, partaking almost of a measure of the heavenly happiness, and become for a while the seat of love and joy and confidence and harmony.

The nature and uses and proper employments of a Christian Sabbath have been pointed out more particularly, not only because the day will be found, when thus employed, eminently conducive, through the divine blessing, to the maintenance of the religious principle in activity and vigour, but also because we all must have had occasion often to remark, that many persons, of the graver and more decent sort, seem not seldom to be nearly destitute of religious resources. The Sunday is with them, to say the best of it, a heavy day; and that larger part of it which is not claimed by the public offices of the church, dully draws on in comfortless vacuity, or without improvement is trifled away in vain and unprofitable discourse. Not to speak of those who, by their more daring profanation of this sacred season, openly violate the laws, and insult the religion of their country, how little do many seem to enter into the spirit of the institution, who are not wholly inattentive to its exterior decorums ! How glad are they to qualify the rigour of their religious labours ! How hardly do they plead against being compelled to devote the whole of the day to religion, claiming to themselves no small merit for giving up to it a part, and purchasing therefore, as they hope, a right to spend the remainder more agreeably ! How dexterously do they avail themselves of any plausible plea for introducing some week-day employment into the Sunday, whilst they have not the same propensity to introduce any of the Sunday's peculiar employment into the rest of the week ! How often do they find excuses for taking journeys, writing letters, balancing accounts ; or, in short, doing something, which, by a little management, might probably have been anticipated, or which, without any material inconvenience, might be postponed ! Even business itself is recreation, compared with religion ; and from the drudgery of this day of sacred rest, they fly for relief to their ordinary occupations.

Others, again, who would consider business as a profanation, and who still hold out against the encroachments of the card-table, get over much of the day, and gladly seek for an innocent resource, in the social circle, or in family visits, where it is not even pretended that the conversation turns on such topics as might render it in any way conducive to religious instruction or improvement. Their families meanwhile are neglected, their servants robbed of Christian privileges, and their example quoted by others, who cannot see that they are themselves less religiously employed, while playing an innocent game at cards, or relaxing in the concert-room.

But all these several artifices, whatever they may be, to unhallow the Sunday and to change its character, (it might be almost said "to mitigate its horrors,") prove but too plainly, that religion, however we may be glad to take refuge in it, when driven to it by the loss of every other comfort, and to retain as it were a reversionary interest in an asylum which may receive us when we are forced from the transitory enjoyments of our present state, wears to us in itself a gloomy and forbidden aspect, and not a face of consolation and joy; that the worship of God is with us a constrained, and not a willing service, which we are glad therefore to abridge, though we dare not omit it.

Some indeed there are, who, with concern and grief, will confess this to be their uncomfortable and melancholy state; who humbly pray, and diligently endeavour for an imagination less distracted at devotional seasons, for a heart more capable of relishing the excellence of divine things; and who carefully guard against whatever has a tendency to chain down their affections to earthly enjoyments. Let not such be discouraged. It is not they whom we are condemning, but such as knowing and even acknowledging this to be their case, yet proceed in a way directly contrary: who, scarcely seeming to suspect that anything is wrong with them, voluntarily acquiesce in a state of mind which is directly contrary to the positive commands of God, which forms a perfect contrast to the representations given us in Scripture of the Christian character, and accords but too faithfully, in one leading feature, with the character of those who are stated to be the objects of divine displeasure in this life, and of divine punishment in the next.

It is not, however, only in these essential constituents of a devotional frame that the bulk of nominal Christians are defective. This they freely declare (secretly feeling perhaps some complacency from the frankness of the avowal) to be a higher strain of piety than that to which they aspire. Their forgetfulness also of some of the leading dispositions of Christianity, is undeniably apparent in their allowed want of the spirit of kindness and meekness and gentleness and patience and long-suffering; and, above all, of that which is the stock on which alone these dispositions can grow and flourish, that humility and lowliness of mind, in which, perhaps more than in any other quality, may be said to consist the true essence and vital principle of the Christian temper. These dispositions are not only neglected, but even disavowed and exploded, and their opposites, if not rising to any great height, are acknowledged and applauded. A just pride, a proper and becoming pride, are terms which we daily hear from Christian lips. To possess a high spirit, to behave with a proper spirit when used ill—by which is meant a quick feeling of injuries, and a promptness in resenting them—entitles to commendation; and a meek-spirited disposition, the highest Scripture eulogium, expresses ideas of disapprobation and contempt. Vanity and vainglory are suffered without interruption to retain their natural possession of the heart.—But here a topic opens upon us of such importance, and on which so many mistakes are to be found, both in the writings of respectable authors, and in the commonly prevailing opinions of the world, that it may be allowed us to discuss it more at large, and for this purpose to treat of it in a separate section.

SECT. III.

*On the Desire of human Estimation and applause.
—the generally prevailing opinions contrasted with those of the true Christian.*

The desire of human estimation and distinction and honour, of the admiration and applause of our fellow-creatures, if we take it in its full comprehension, and in all its various modifications, from the thirst of glory to the dread of shame, is the passion of which the empire is by far the most general, and perhaps the authority the most commanding. Though its power be most conspicuous and least controllable in the higher classes of society, it seems, like some resistless conqueror, to spare neither age, nor sex, nor condition; and taking ten thousand shapes, insinuating itself under the most specious pretexts, and sheltering itself when necessary under the most artful disguises, it winds its way in secret, when it dares not openly avow itself, and mixes in all we think and speak and do. It is in some instances the determined and declared pursuit, and confessedly the main practical principle; but where this is not the case, it is not seldom the grand spring of action, and in the Beauty and the Author, no less than in the Soldier, it is often the master passion of the soul.

This is the principle which parents recognise with joy in their infant offspring, which is diligently instilled and nurtured in advancing years, which, under the names of honourable ambition and of laudable emulation, it is the professed aim of schools and colleges to excite and cherish. The writer is well aware, that it will be thought he is pushing his opinions much too far, when he ventures to assail this great principle of human action—"a principle," its advocates might perhaps exclaim, "the extinction of which, if you could succeed in your rash attempt, would be like the annihilation, in the material world, of the principle of motion; without it all were torpid and cold and comfortless. We grant," they might go on to observe, "that we never ought to deviate from the paths of duty in order to procure the applause or to avoid the reproaches of men, and we allow that this is a rule too little attended to in practice. We grant that the love of praise is in some instances a ridiculous, and in others a mischievous passion; that to it we owe the breed of coquettes and coxcombs, and, a more serious evil, the noxious race of heroes and conquerors. We too are ready, when it appears in the shape of vanity, to smile at it as a foible, or in that of false glory, to condemn it as a crime. But all these are only its perversions; and, on account of them, to contend against its true forms, and its legitimate exercise, were to give in to the very error which you formerly yourself condemned, of arguing against the use of a salutary principle altogether, on account of its being liable to occasional abuse. When turned into the right direction, and applied to its true purposes, it prompts to every dignified and generous enterprise. It is erudition in the portico, skill in the lyceum, eloquence in the senate, victory in the field. It forces indolence into activity, and extorts from vice itself the deeds of generosity and virtue. When once the soul is warmed by its generous ardour, no difficulties deter, no dangers terrify, no labours tire. It is this which, giving by its stamp to what is virtuous and honourable its just superiority over the gifts of birth and fortune, rescues the rich from a base subjection to the pleasures of sense, and makes them prefer a course of toil and hardship to a life of indulgence and ease. It prevents the man of rank from acquiescing in his hereditary greatness, and spurs him forward in pursuit of personal distinction, and of a nobility which he may justly term his own. It moderates and qualifies the over great inequalities of human conditions; and, reaching to those who are above the sphere of laws, and extending to cases which fall not within their province, it limits and circumscribes the power of the tyrant on his throne, and gives gentleness to war, and to pride, humility.

“ Nor is its influence confined to public life, nor is it known only in the great and the splendid. To it is to be ascribed a large portion of that courtesy and disposition to please, which, naturally producing a mutual appearance of goodwill, and a reciprocation of good offices, constitute much of the comfort of private life, and give their choicest sweets to social and domestic intercourse. Nay, from the force of habit, it follows us even into solitude, and in our most secret retirements we often act as if our conduct were subject to human observation, and we derive no small complacency from the imaginary applauses of an ideal spectator."

So far of the effects of the love of praise and distinction; and if, after enumerating some of these, you should proceed to investigate its nature, "We admit," it might be added, "that a hasty and misjudging world often misapplies commendations and censures; and whilst we therefore confess, that the praises of the discerning few are alone truly valuable, we acknowledge that it were better if mankind were always to act from the sense of right and the love of virtue, without reference to the opinions of their fellow-creatures. We even allow, that, independently of consequences, this were perhaps in itself a higher strain of virtue; but it is a degree of purity which it would be vain to expect from the bulk of mankind. When the intrinsic excellence of this principle, however, is called in question, let it be remembered, that in its higher degrees it was styled, by one who meant rather to detract from its merits than to aggravate them, 'the infirmity of noble minds; and surely, that in such a soil it most naturally springs up and flourishes, is no small proof of its exalted origin and generous nature.

"But were these more dubious, and were it no more than a splendid error, yet considering that it works so often in the right direction, it were enough to urge in its behalf, that it is a principle of real action, and approved energy. That, as much as practice is better than theory, and solid realities than empty speculation, so much is it to be preferred for general use before those higher principles of morals, which, however just and excellent in themselves, you would in vain attempt to bring home to the ‘business and bosoms of mankind’ at large. Reject not then a principle thus universal in its influence, thus valuable in its effects; a principle, which, by whatever name you may please to call it, acts by motives and considerations suited to our conditions; and which, putting it at the very lowest, must be confessed, in our present infirm state, to be an habitual aid and an ever-present support to the feebleness of virtue! In a selfish world it produces the effects of disinterestedness, and, when public spirit is extinct, it supplies the want of patriotism. Let us therefore with gratitude avail ourselves of its help, and not relinquish the good which it freely offers, from we know not what vain dreams of impracticable purity and unattainable perfection.”

All this and much more might be urged by the advocates of this favourite principle. It would be, however, no difficult task to show that it by no means merits this high eulogium. To say nothing of that larger part of the argument of our opponents, which betrays, and even proceeds upon, that mischievous notion of the innocence of error, against which we have already entered our formal protest, the principle in question is manifestly of a most inconstant and variable nature; as inconstant and variable as the innumerably diversified modes of fashions, habits, and opinions, in different periods and societies. What it tolerates in one age, it forbids in another; what in one country it prescribes and applauds, in another it condemns and stigmatizes! Obviously and openly, it often takes vice into its patronage, and sets itself in direct opposition to virtue. It is calculated to produce rather the appearance than the reality of excellence; and at best not to check the love but only the commission of vice. Much of this indeed was seen and acknowledged by the philosophers, and even by the poets, of the pagan world. They declaimed against it as a mutable and inconsistent principle; they lamented the fatal effects which, under the name of false glory, it had produced on the peace and happiness of mankind. They condemned the pursuit of it when it led its followers out of the path of virtue, and taught that the praise of the wise and of the good only was to be desired.

But it was reserved for the page of Scripture to point out to us distinctly wherein it is apt to be essentially defective and vicious, and to discover to us more fully its encroaching nature and dangerous tendencies; teaching us, at the same time, how, being purified from its corrupt qualities, and reduced under just subordination, it may be brought into legitimate exercise, and be directed to its true end.

In the sacred volume we are throughout reminded, that we are originally the creatures of God's formation, and continual dependants on his bounty. There too we learn the painful lesson of man's degradation and unworthiness. We learn that humiliation and contrition are the dispositions of mind best suited to our fallen condition, and most acceptable in the sight of our Creator. We learn, that to the repression and extinction of that spirit of arrogance and self-importance which are so natural to the heart of man, it should be our habitual care to cherish and cultivate these lowly tempers; studiously maintaining a continual sense, that, not only for all the natural advantages over others which we may possess, but for all our moral superiority also, we are altogether indebted to the unmerited goodness of God. It might perhaps be said to be the great end and purpose of all revelation, and especially to be the design of the gospel, to reclaim us from our natural pride and selfishness, and their fatal consequences; to bring us to a just sense of our weakness and depravity; and to dispose us, with unfeigned humiliation, to abase ourselves and give glory to God. “No flesh may glory in his presence; he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.”—“The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of man shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted.”

These solemn admonitions are too generally disregarded, and their intimate connection with the subject we are now considering, appears to have been often entirely overlooked even by Christian moralists. These authors, without reference to the main spring and internal principle of conduct, are apt to speak of the love of human applause, as being meritorious or culpable—as being the desire of true or of false glory—according as the external actions it produces, and the pursuits to which it prompts, are beneficial or mischievous to mankind. But it is undeniably manifest, that, in the judgment of the word of God, the love of worldly admiration and applause is in its nature essentially and radically corrupt; so far as it partakes of a disposition to exalt and aggrandize ourselves, to pride ourselves on our natural or acquired endowments, or to assume to ourselves the merit and credit of our good qualities, instead of ascribing all the honour and glory where only they are due. Its guilt therefore, in these cases, is not to be measured by its effects on the happiness of mankind: nor is it to be denominated true or false glory according as the ends to which it is directed are just or unjust, beneficial or mischievous, objects of pursuit; but it is false, because it exalts that which ought to be abased; and criminal, because it encroaches on the prerogative of God.

The Scriptures further instruct us, not merely that mankind are liable to error, and therefore that the world's commendations may be sometimes mistaken—but that their judgment being darkened, and their hearts depraved, its applauses and contempt will for the most part be systematically misplaced: that though the beneficent and disinterested spirit of Christianity, and her obvious tendency to promote domestic comfort and general happiness, cannot but extort applause, yet that her aspiring after more than ordinary excellence, by exciting secret misgivings in others, or a painful sense of inferiority, not unmixed with envy, cannot fail often to disgust and offend. The word of God teaches us, that though such of the doctrines and precepts of Christianity, as are coincident with worldly interests and pursuits, and with worldly principles and systems, may be professed without offence—yet, that what is opposite to these, or even different from them, will be deemed needlessly precise and strict, the indulgence of a morose and gloomy humour, the symptoms of a contracted and superstitious spirit, the marks of a mean, enslaved, or distorted understanding. That for these and other reasons, the follower of Christ must not only make up his mind to the occasional relinquishment of worldly favour, but that it should even afford him matter of holy jealousy and suspicion of himself, when it is very lavishly and very generally bestowed.

But though the standard of worldly estimation differed less from that of the gospel, yet, since our affections ought to be set on heavenly things, and conversant about heavenly objects, and since in particular the love and favour of God ought to be the matter of our supreme and habitual desire, to which every other should be rendered subordinate—it follows, that the love of human applause must be manifestly injurious, so far as it tends to draw down our regards to earthly concerns, and to circumscribe our desires within the narrow limits of this world; and that it is impure, so far as it is tinged with a disposition to estimate too highly, and love too well, the good opinion and commendations of man.

But though, by these and other instructions and considerations, the Holy Scripture warns us against the inordinate desire or earnest pursuit of worldly estimation and honour—though it so greatly reduces their value, and prepares us for losing them without surprise, and for relinquishing them with little reluctance—yet it teaches us that Christians are not only not called upon absolutely and voluntarily to renounce or forego them, but that, when without our having solicitously sought them they are bestowed on us for actions intrinsically good, we are to accept them as being intended by Providence to be sometimes, even in this disorderly state of things, a present solace, and a reward to virtue. Nay more, we are instructed, that in our general deportment, that in little particulars of conduct otherwise indifferent, that in the circumstances and manner of performing actions in themselves of a determined character and indispensable obligation, (guarding however against the smallest degree of artifice or deceit,) that by watching for opportunities of doing little kindnesses, that by avoiding singularities, and even humouring prejudices, where it may be done without the slightest infringement of truth or duty, we ought to have a due respect and regard to the approbation and favour of men. These however we should not value chiefly as they may administer to our own gratification, but rather as furnishing means and instruments of influence, which we may turn to good account, by making them subservient to the improvement and happiness of our fellow-creatures, and thus conducive to the glory of God. The remark is almost superfluous, that, on occasions like these, we must even watch our hearts with the most jealous care, lest pride and self-love insensibly infuse themselves, and corrupt the purity of principles so liable to contract a taint.

Credit and reputation, in the judgment of the true Christian, stand on ground not very different from riches; which he is not to prize highly, or to desire and pursue with solicitude; but which, when they are allotted to him by the hand of Providence, he is to accept with thankfulness, and use with moderation; relinquishing them, when it becomes necessary, without a murmur; guarding most circumspectly, so long as they remain with him, against that sensual and selfish temper, and no less against that pride and wantonness of heart, which they are too apt to produce and cherish: thus considering them as in themselves acceptable, but, from the infirmity of his nature, highly dangerous possessions; and valuing them chiefly, not as instruments of luxury or splendour, but as affording the means of honouring his heavenly Benefactor, and lessening the miseries of mankind.

Christianity, be it remembered, proposes not to extinguish our natural desires, but to bring them under just control, and direct them to their true objects. In the case both of riches and of honour, she maintains the consistency of her character. While she commands us not to set our hearts on earthly treasures, she reminds us that “we have in heaven a better and more enduring substance” than this world can bestow; and while she represses our solicitude respecting earthly credit, and moderates our attachment to it, she holds forth to us, and bids us habitually to aspire after, the splendours of that better state, where is true glory and honour and immortality; thus exciting in us a just ambition, suited to our high origin, and worthy of our large capacities, which the little, misplaced, and perishable distinctions of this life would in vain attempt to satisfy.

It would be mere waste of time to enter into any laboured argument to prove at large, that the light in which worldly credit and estimation are regarded by the bulk of professed Christians, is extremely different from that in which they are placed by the page of Scripture. The inordinate love of worldly glory, indeed, implies a passion, which, from the nature of things, cannot be called into exercise in the generality of mankind; because, being conversant about great objects, it can but rarely find that field which is requisite for its exertions. But we every where discover the same principle reduced to the dimensions of common life, and modified and directed according to every one's sphere of action. We may discover it in a supreme love of distinction and admiration and praise: in the universal acceptableness of flattery; and, above all, in the excessive valuation of our worldly character, in that watchfulness with which it is guarded, in that jealousy when it is questioned, in that solicitude when it is in danger, in that hot resentment when it is attacked, in that bitterness of suffering when it is impaired or lost. All these emotions, as they are too manifest to be disputed, so are they too reputable to be denied. Dishonour, disgrace, and shame, present images of horror too dreadful to be faced; they are evils, which it is thought the mark of a generous spirit to consider as excluding every idea of comfort and enjoyment, and to feel as too heavy to be borne.

The consequences of all this are natural and obvious. Though it be not openly avowed that we are to follow after worldly estimation, or to escape from worldly disrepute, when they can only be pursued or avoided by declining from the path of duty; nay, though the contrary be recognised as being the just opinion, yet all the effect of this speculative concession is soon done away in fact. Estimating worldly credit as of the highest intrinsic excellence, and worldly shame as the greatest of all possible evils, we sometimes shape and turn the path of duty itself from its true direction, so as it may favour our acquisition of the one, and avoidance of the other; or, when this cannot be done, we boldly and openly turn aside from it, declaring the temptation is too strong to be resisted.

It were easy to adduce numerous proofs of the truth of these assertions. It is proved, indeed, by that general tendency in religion to conceal herself from the view, (for we might hope that in these cases she often is by no means altogether extinct,) by her being apt to vanish from our conversations, and even to give place to a pretended licentiousness of sentiments and conduct, and a false show of infidelity. It is proved by that complying acquiescence, and participation in the habits and manners of this dissipated age, which has almost confounded every external distinction between the Christian and the Infidel, and has made it so rare to find any one who dares incur the charge of Christian singularity, or who can say with the apostle, that "he is not ashamed of the gospel of Christ." It is proved (how can this proof be omitted by one to whose lot it has so often fallen to witness and lament, sometimes he fears to afford an instance of it!) by that quick resentment, those bitter contentions, those angry retorts, those malicious triumphs, that impatience of inferiority, that wakeful sense of past defeats, and promptness to revenge them, which too often change the character of a Christian deliberative assembly into that of a stage for prize-fighters; violating at once the proprieties of public conduct, and the rules of social decorum, and renouncing and chasing away all the charities of the religion of Jesus.

But from all lesser proofs, our attention is drawn to one of a still larger size, and more determined character. Surely the reader will here anticipate our mention of the practice of dueling—a practice which, to the disgrace of a Christian society, has long been suffered to exist with little restraint or opposition.

This practice, whilst it powerfully supports, chiefly rests on, that excessive overvaluation of character, which teaches, that worldly credit is to be preserved at any rate, and disgrace at any rate to be avoided. The unreasonableness of dueling has been often proved, and it has often been shown to be criminal on various principles; sometimes it has been opposed on grounds hardly tenable; particularly when it has been considered as an indication of malice and revenge.* But it seems hardly to have been enough noticed in what chiefly consists its essential guilt; that it is a deliberate preference of the favour of man, before the favour and approbation of God, in articulo mortis, in an instance, wherein our own life and that of a fellow-creature are at stake, and wherein we run the risk of rushing into the presence of our Maker in the very act of offending him. It would detain us too long, and it were somewhat beside our present purpose, to enumerate the mischievous consequences which result from this practice. They are many and great; and if regard be had merely to the temporal interests of men, and to the wellbeing of society, they are but poorly counterbalanced by the plea, which must be admitted in its behalf by a candid observer of human nature, of a courtesy and refinement in our modern manners unknown to ancient times.

But there is one observation which must not be omitted, and which seems to have been too much overlooked. In the judgment of that religion which requires purity of heart, and of that Being to whom, as was before remarked, "thought is action," he cannot be esteemed innocent of this crime, who lives in a settled habitual determination to commit it when circumstances shall call upon him so to do.* This is a consideration which places the crime of dueling on a different footing from almost any other; indeed there is perhaps no other, which mankind habitually and deliberately resolve to practise whenever the temptation shall occur. It shows also that the crime of dueling is far more general in the higher classes than is commonly supposed, and that the whole sum of the guilt which the practice produces is great, beyond what has perhaps been ever conceived! It will be the writer's comfort to have solemnly suggested this consideration to the consciences of those by whom this impious practice might be suppressed. If such there be, which he is strongly inclined to believe, theirs is the crime, and theirs the responsibility, of suffering it to continue.†

* See Hey's Tracts, Rousseau's Eloisa, and many periodical Essays and Sermons.

* See "Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her," &c. Matth. v, 28.

† The writer cannot omit this opportunity of declaring, that he should long ago have brought this subject before the notice of parliament, but for a perfect conviction that he should probably thereby only give encouragement to a system he wishes to see at an end. The practice has been at different periods nearly stopped by positive laws, in various nations on the Continent; and there can be little doubt of the efficacy of what has been more than once suggested—a Court of Honour, to take cognizance of such offences as would naturally fall within its province. The effects of this establishment would doubtless require to be enforced by legislative provisions, directly punishing the practice; and by discouraging at court, and in the military and naval situations, all who should directly or indirectly be guilty of it.

In the foregoing observations, it has not been the writer's intention to discuss completely that copious subject, the love of worldly estimation. It would be to exceed the limits of a work like this, fully to investigate {so large and at the same time so important a topic. Enough, however, may have perhaps been said, to make it evident that this principle is of a character highly questionable; that it should be brought under absolute subjection, and watched with the most jealous care. That, notwithstanding its lofty pretensions, it often can by no means justly boast that high origin and exalted nature which its superficial admirers are disposed to concede to it. What real intrinsic essential value, it might be asked, does there appear to be in a virtue which had wholly changed its nature and character, if public opinion had been different? But it is in truth of base extraction, and ungenerous qualities; it springs from selfishness, and vanity, and low ambition: by these it subsists and thrives and acts; and envy and jealousy and detraction and hatred and variance are its too faithful and natural associates. It is, to say the best of it, a root which bears fruits of a poisonous as well as of a beneficial quality. If it sometimes stimulates to great and generous enterprises, if it urges to industry, and sometimes to excellence, if, in the more contracted sphere, it produces courtesy and kindness—yet to its account we must place the ambition which desolates nations, and many of the competitions and resentments which interrupt the harmony of social life. The former indeed has been often laid to its charge, but the latter have not been sufficiently attended to; and still less has its noxious influence on the vital principle, and distinguishing graces, of the Christian character, been duly pointed out and enforced.

To read indeed the writings of certain Christian moralists,* and to observe how little they seem disposed to call it in question, except where it raves in the conqueror, one should be almost tempted to suspect, that, considering it as a principle of such potency and prevalence, as that they must despair of bringing it into just subjection, they were intent only on complimenting it into good humour, (like those barbarous nations which worship the evil spirit through fear;) or rather, that they were making a sort of composition with an enemy they could not master; and were willing, on condition of its giving up the trade of war, to suffer it to rule undisturbed, and range at pleasure.

But the truth is, that the reasonings of Christian moralists too often exhibit but few traces of the genius of Christian morality. Of this position, the case before us is an instance. This principle of the desire of worldly distinction and applause, is often allowed, and even commended, with too few qualifications, and too little reserve. To covet wealth is base and sordid; but to covet honour is treated as the mark of a generous and exalted nature. These writers scarcely seem to bear in mind, that, though the principle in question tends to prevent the commission of those grosser acts of vice which would injure us in the general estimation, yet that it not only stops there, but that it there begins to exert almost an equal force in the opposite direction. They do not consider how apt this principle is, even in the case of those who move in a contracted sphere, to fill us with vain conceits and vicious passions; and, above all, how it tends to fix the affections on earthly things, and to steal away the heart from God. They acknowledge it to be criminal when it produces mischievous effects; but forget how apt it is, by the substitution of a false and corrupt motive, to vitiate the purity of our good actions, depriving them of every thing which rendered them truly and essentially valuable. They do not consider, that whilst they too hastily applaud it as taking the side of virtue, it often works her ruin while it asserts her cause; and, like some vile seducer, pretends affection only the more surely to betray.

* See, in particular, a paper in the Guardian, by Addison, on Honour, Vol. ii.

It is the distinguishing glory of Christianity not to rest satisfied with superficial appearances, but to rectify the motives, and purify the heart. The true Christian, in obedience to the lessons of Scripture, no where keeps over himself a more resolute and jealous guard, than where the desire of human estimation and distinction is in question. No where does he more deeply feel the insufficiency of his unassisted strength, or more diligently and earnestly pray for divine assistance. He may well indeed watch and pray against the encroachments of a passion, which, when suffered to transgress its just limits, discovers a peculiar hostility to the distinguishing graces of the Christian temper; a passion which must insensibly acquire force, because it is in continual exercise; a passion to which almost every thing without administers nutriment, and the growth of which within is favoured and cherished by such powerful auxiliaries as pride and selfishness, the natural and perhaps inexterminable inhabitants of the human heart.

Strongly impressed, therefore, with a sense of the indispensable necessity of guarding against the progress of this encroaching principle, in humble reliance of superior aid, the true Christian thankfully uses the means, and habitually exercises himself in the considerations and motives, suggested to him for that purpose by the word of God. He is much occupied in searching out, and contemplating his own infirmities. He endeavours to acquire and maintain a just conviction of his great unworthiness; and to keep in continual remembrance, that whatever distinguishes himself from others is not properly his own, but that he is altogether indebted for it to the undeserved bounty of Heaven. He diligently endeavours, also, habitually to preserve a just sense of the real worth of human distinction and applause, knowing that he shall covet them less when he has learned not to overrate their value. He labours to bear in mind, how undeservedly they are often bestowed, how precariously they are always possessed. The censures of good men justly render him suspicious of himself, and prompt him carefully and impartially to examine into those parts of his character, or those particulars of his conduct, which have drawn on him their animadversions. The favourable opinion and the praises of good men are justly acceptable to him, where they accord with the testimony of his own heart; that testimony being thereby confirmed and warranted. Those praises favour also and strengthen the growth of mutual confidence and affection, where it is his delight to form friendships, rich not less in use than comfort, and to establish connexions which may last for ever. But even in the case of the commendations of good men, he suffers not himself to be beguiled into an overvaluation of them, lest he should be led to substitute them in the place of conscience. He guards against this by reflecting how indistinctly we can discern each other's motives, how little enter into each other's circumstances, how mistaken therefore may be the judgments formed of us, or of our actions, even by good men; and that it is far from improbable, that a time may come, in which we may be compelled to forfeit their esteem, by adhering to the dictates of our own consciences.

But if he endeavours thus to sit loose to the favour and applause even of good men, much more to those of the world at large; not but that he is sensible of their worth as means and instruments of usefulness and influence, and, under the limitations and for the ends allowed in Scripture, he is glad to possess, observant to acquire, and careful to retain them. He considers them, however, if we may again introduce the metaphor, like the precious metals, as having rather an exchangeable than an intrinsic value, as desirable, not simply in their possession, but in their use. In this view, he holds himself to be responsible for that share of them which he enjoys, and (to continue the figure) as bound not to let them lie by him unemployed, this were hoarding; not to lavish them prodigally, this would be waste; not imprudently to misapply them, this were folly and caprice; but as under an obligation to regard them as conferred on him, that they might be brought into action: which therefore he feels not himself at liberty to throw away, though he is ready, if it be required, to relinquish them with cheerfulness; nor, on the other hand, dares he acquire or retain them unlawfully, in consideration of the use he intends to make of them. He holds it to be his bounden duty to seek diligently for occasions of rendering them subservient to their true purposes; and when any such occasion is found, to expend them cheerfully and liberally, but with discretion and frugality; being no less prudent in determining the measure, than in selecting the objects, of their application, that they may go the farther by being thus managed with economy.

Acting therefore on these principles, he will studiously and diligently use any degree of worldly credit he may enjoy in removing or lessening prejudices; in conciliating goodwill, and thereby making way for the less obstructed progress of truth; and in providing for its being entertained with candour, or even with favour, by those who would bar all access against it in any rougher or more homely form. He will make it his business to set on foot and forward benevolent and useful schemes; and, where they require united efforts, to obtain and preserve for them this co-operation. He will endeavour to discountenance vice, to bring modest merit into notice; to lend as it were his light to men of real worth, but of less creditable name, and perhaps of less conciliating qualities and manners, that they may thus shine with a reflected lustre, and be useful in their turn, when invested with their just estimation. But while, by these and various other means, he strives to render his reputation, so long as he possesses it, subservient to the great ends of advancing the cause of religion and virtue, and of promoting the happiness and comfort of mankind, he will not transgress the rule of the Scripture precepts, in order to obtain, to cultivate, or to preserve it; resolutely disclaiming that dangerous sophistry of “doing evil that good may come.” Ready, however, to relinquish his reputation when required so to do, he will not throw it away: and, so far as he allowably may, he will cautiously avoid occasions of diminishing it, instead of studiously seeking, or needlessly multiplying them, as seems sometimes to have been the practice of worthy but imprudent men. There will be no capricious humours, no selfish tempers, no moroseness, no discourtesy, no affected severity of deportment, no peculiarity of language, no indolent neglect, or wanton breach, of the ordinary forms or fashions of society. His reputation is a possession capable of uses too important to be thus sported away; if sacrificed at all, it shall be sacrificed at the call of duty. The world shall be constrained to allow him to be amiable, as well as respectable in other parts of his character; though, in what regards religion, they may account him unreasonably precise and strict. In this, no less than in other particulars, he will endeavour to reduce the enemies of religion to adopt the confession of the accusers of the Jewish ruler, “We shall not find any fault or occasion against this Daniel—except concerning the law of his God:” and even there, if he give offence, it will only be where he dares not do otherwise; and if he fall into disesteem or disgrace, it shall not be chargeable to any conduct which is justly dishonourable, or even to any unnecessary singularities on his part, but to the false standard of estimation of a misjudging world. When his character is thus mistaken, or his conduct thus misconstrued, he will not wrap himself up in a mysterious sullenness; but will be ready, where he thinks any one will listen to him with patience and candour, to clear up what has been dubious, to explain what has been imperfectly known, and, “speaking the truth in love,” to correct, if it may be, the erroneous impressions which have been conceived of him. He may sometimes feel it his duty publicly to vindicate his character from unjust reproach, and to repel the false charges of his enemies; but he will carefully, however, watch against being led away by pride, or being betrayed into some breach of truth or of Christian charity, when he is treading in a path so dangerous. At such a time he will also guard, with more than ordinary circumspection, against any undue solicitude about his worldly reputation, for its own sake; and when he has done what duty requires for its vindication, he will sit down with a peaceable and quiet mind, and it will be matter of no very deep concern to him if his endeavours should have been ineffectual. If good men, in every age and nation, have been often unjustly calumniated and disgraced, and if, in such circumstances, even the darkness of Paganism has been able contentedly to repose itself on the consciousness of innocence, shall one, who is cheered by the Christian’s hope, who is assured also, that a day will shortly come in which whatever is secret shall be made manifest, and the mistaken judgments of men, perhaps even of good men, being corrected, that “he shall then have praise of God,”—shall such a one, I say, sink?—shall he even bend or droop under such a trial? They might be more excusable in overvaluing human reputation, to whom all beyond the grave was dark and cheerless. They also might be more easily pardoned for pursuing, with some degree of eagerness and solicitude, that glory which might survive them; thus seeking as it were to extend the narrow span of their earthly existence; but far different is our case, to whom these clouds are rolled away, and “life and immortality are brought to light by the gospel.” Not but that worldly favour and distinction are amongst the best things this world has to offer, but the Christian knows it is the very condition of his calling not to have his portion here; and, as in the case of any other earthly enjoyments, so in that also of worldly honour, he dreads, lest his supreme affections being thereby gratified, it should be hereafter said to him, “Remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things.”

He is enjoined by his holy calling to be victorious over the world; and to this victory, an indifference to its disesteem and dishonour is essentially and indispensably required. He reflects on those holy men who “had trial of cruel mockings;” he remembers that our blessed Saviour himself “was despised and rejected of men;” and what is he, that he should be exempted from the common lot, or think it much to bear the scandal of his profession? If therefore he is creditable and popular, he considers this, if the phrase may be pardoned, as something beyond his bargain; and he watches himself with double care, lest he should grow over-fond of what he may be shortly called upon to relinquish. He meditates often on the probability of his being involved in such circumstances as may render it necessary for him to subject himself to disgrace and obloquy; thus familiarizing himself with them betimes, and preparing himself, that, when the trying hour arrives, they may not take him unawares.

But the cultivation of the desire of "that honour which cometh from God," he finds the most effectual means of bringing his mind into a proper temper, in what regards the love of human approbation. Christian! wouldst thou indeed reduce this affection under just control—sursum corda! Rise on the wings of contemplation, untill the praises and the censures of men die away upon the ear, and the still small voice of conscience is no longer drowned by the din of this nether world. Here the sight is apt to be occupied with earthly objects, and the hearing to be engrossed with earthly sounds; but there thou shalt come within the view of that resplendent and incorruptible crown, which is held forth to thine acceptance in the realms of light, and thine ear shall be regaled with heavenly melody! Here we dwell in a variable atmosphere—the prospect is at one time darkened by the gloom of disgrace, and at another the eye is dazzled by the gleamings of glory; but thou hast now ascended above this inconstant region; no storms agitate, no clouds obscure the air; the lightnings play and the thunders roll beneath thee.

Thus, at chosen seasons, the Christian exercises himself: and when, from this elevated region, he descends into the plain below, and mixes in the bustle of life, he still retains the impressions of his more retired hours. By these he realizes to himself the unseen world; he accustoms himself to speak and act as in the presence of “an innumerable company of angels, and of the spirits of just men made perfect, and of God the Judge of all.” The consciousness of their approbation cheers and gladdens his soul, under the scoffs and reproaches of an undiscerning world; and to his delighted ear, their united praises form a harmony which a few discordant earthly voices cannot interrupt.

But though the Christian be sometimes enabled thus to triumph over the inordinate love of human applause, he does not therefore deem himself secure from its encroachments. On the contrary, he is aware, so strong and active is its principle of vitality, that even where it seems extinct, let but circumstances favour its revival, and it will spring forth again in renewed vigour. And as his watchfulness must thus during life know no termination, because the enemy will ever be at hand—so it must be the more close and vigilant, because he is nowhere free from danger, but is on every side open to attack. “Sume superbiam quæsitam meritis,” was the maxim of a worldly moralist; but the Christian is aware, that he is particularly assailable where he really excels; there he is in especial danger, lest his motives, originally pure, being insensibly corrupted, he should be betrayed into an anxiety about worldly favour, false in principle or excessive in degree, when he is endeavouring to render his virtue amiable and respected in the eyes of others, and, in obedience to the Scripture injunction, is willing to let his "light so shine before men, that they may see his good works, and glorify his Father which is in heaven."

He watches himself also on small as well as on great occasions; the latter indeed, in the case of many persons, can hardly ever be expected to occur; whereas the former are continually presenting themselves: and thus, whilst on the one hand, they may be rendered highly useful in forming and strengthening a just habit of mind with respect to the opinion of the world, so, on the other, they are the means most at hand for enabling us to discover our own real character. Let not this be slightly passed over. If any one finds himself shrinking from disrepute or disesteem in little instances, but apt to solace himself with the persuasion, that, his spirits being fully called forth to the encounter, he could boldly stand the brunt of sharper trials: let him be slow to give entertainment to so beguiling a suggestion; and let him not forget, that these little instances, where no credit is to be got, and the vainest can find small room for self-complacency, furnish perhaps the truest tests whether we are ashamed of the gospel of Christ, and are willing, on principles really pure, to bear reproach for the name of Jesus.

The Christian too is well aware that the excessive desire of human approbation is a passion of so subtle a nature, that there is nothing into which it cannot penetrate: and, from much experience, learning to discover it where it would lurk unseen, and to detect it under its more specious disguises, he finds, that, elsewhere disallowed and excluded, it is apt to insinuate itself into his very religion, where it especially delights to dwell, and obstinately maintains its residence. Proud piety and ostentatious charity, and all the more open effects it there produces, have been often condemned, and we may discover the tendencies to them in ourselves, without difficulty. But where it appears not so large in bulk, and in shape so unambiguous, let its operation be still suspected. Let not the Christian suffer himself to be deceived by any external dissimilitudes between himself and the world around him, trusting perhaps to the sincerity of the principle to which they originally owed their rise; but let him beware lest, through the insensible encroachments of the subtile usurper, his religion should at length have “only a name to live,” being gradually robbed of its vivifying principle; lest he should be chiefly preserved in his religious course by the dread of incurring the charge of levity, for quitting a path on which he had deliberately entered. Or where, on a strict and impartial scrutiny of his governing motives, he may fairly conclude this not to be the case, let him beware lest he be influensed by this principle in particular parts of his character, and especially where any external singularities are in question; closely scrutinizing his apparent motives, lest he should be prompted to his more than ordinary religious observances, and be kept from participating in the licentious pleasures of a dissipated age, not so much by a vigorous principle of internal holiness, as by a fear of lessening himself in the good opinion of the stricter circle of his associates, or of suffering even in the estimation of the world at large, by violating the properties of his assumed character.

To those who, in the important particular which we have been so long discussing, wish to conform themselves to the injunctions of the word of God, we must advise a laborious watchfulness, a jealous guard, a close and frequent scrutiny of their own hearts, that they may not mistake their real character, and too late find themselves to have been mistaken as to what they had conceived to be their governing motives. Above all, let them labour, with humble prayers for the divine assistance, to fix in themselves a deep, habitual, and practical sense of the excellence of "that honour which cometh from God," and of the comparative worthlessness of all earthly estimation and pre-eminence. In truth, unless the affections of the soul be thus predominantly engaged on the side of heaven in preference to that of human honour, though we may have relinquished the pursuit of fame, we shall not have acquired that firm contexture of mind which can bear disgrace and shame without yielding to the pressure. Between these two states, the disregarding of fame, and the bearing of disgrace, there is a wide interval; and he who, on a sober review of his conduct and motives, finds reason to believe he has arrived at the one, must not therefore conclude he has reached the other. To the one, a little natural moderation and quietness of temper may be sufficient to conduct us; but to the other, we can only attain by much discipline and slow advances; and when we think we have made great way, we shall often find reason to confess, in the hour of trial, that we had greatly, far too greatly, overrated our progress.

When engaged too in the prosecution of this course, we must be aware of the snares which lie in our way, and of the deceits to which we are liable; and we must be provided against these impositions, by obtaining a full and distinct conception of the temper of mind with regard to human favour, which is prescribed to us in the Scriptures: and, by continually examining our hearts and lives, to ascertain how far we correspond with it. This will keep us from substituting contemplation in the place of action, and from giving ourselves too much up to those religious meditations which were formerly recommended; in which we must not indulge to the neglect of the common duties of life. This will keep us also from mistaking the gratification of an indolent temper for the Christian's disregard of fame: for, let it never be forgotten, we must deserve estimation though we should not possess it; we must force the men of the world to acknowledge that we do not want their boasted spring of action to set us in motion, but that its place is better supplied to us by another, which produces all the good of theirs without its evil: thus demonstrating the superiority of the principle which animates us, by the superior utility and excellence of its effects. The worldly principle may indeed render us kind, friendly, and beneficent; but it will no longer instigate us to promote the happiness or comfort of others than whilst we are stimulated by the desire of their applause; which desire, whatever may be vaunted of its effects on social intercourse, is often nothing better than selfishness, ill concealed under a superficial covering of exterior courtesy. The Christian principle, on the contrary, will operate uniformly, whether approved or not: it must, however, in order to approve itself genuine, be nerved indeed with more than mortal firmness, but at the same time be sweetened by love and tempered with humility.

Humility, again, reducing us in our own value, will moderate our claims on worldly estimation. It will check our tendency to ostentation and display, prompting us rather to avoid than to attract notice. It will dispose us to sit down in quiet obscurity, though, judging ourselves impartially, we believe ourselves better entitled to credit than those on whom it is conferred; closing the entrance against a proud, painful, and malignant passion, from which, under such circumstances, we can otherwise be hardly free, the passion of "high disdain from sense of injured merit."

Love and humility will concur in producing a frame of mind, not more distinct from an ardent thirst of glory than from that frigid disregard, or insolent contempt, or ostentatious renunciation of human favour and distinction, which we have sometimes seen opposed to it. These latter qualities may not unfrequently be traced to a slothful, sensual, and selfish temper; to the consciousness of being unequal to any great and generous attempts; to the disappointment of schemes of ambition or of glory; to a little personal experience of the world's capricious and inconstant humour. The renunciation, in these cases, however sententious, is often far from sincere; and it is even made, not unfrequently, with a view to the attainment of that very distinction which it affects to disclaim. In some other of these instances, the overvaluation and inordinate desire of worldly credit, however disavowed, are abundantly evident, from the merit which is assumed for relinquishing them; or from that sour and surly humour, which betrays a gloomy and a corroded mind, galled and fretting under the irritating sense of the want of that which it most wishes to possess.

But far different is the temper of a Christian. Not a temper of sordid sensuality, or lazy apathy, or dogmatizing pride, or disappointed ambition: more truly independent of worldly estimation than philosophy with all her boasts, it forms a perfect contrast to Epicurean selfishness, and to Stoical pride, and to Cynical brutality. It is a temper compounded of firmness and complacency and peace and love; and manifesting itself in acts of kindness and of courtesy; a kindness, not pretended but genuine; a courtesy, not false and superficial, but cordial and sincere. In the hour of popularity, it is not intoxicated or insolent; in the hour of unpopularity, it is not desponding or morose; unshaken in constancy, unwearied in benevolence, firm without roughness, and assiduous without servility.

Notwithstanding the great importance of the topic which we have been investigating, it will require much indulgence on the part of the reader, to excuse the disproportionate length into which the discussion has been almost insensibly drawn out; yet this, it is hoped, may not be without its uses, if the writer have in any degree succeeded in his endeavour, to point out the dangerous qualities and unchristian tendencies of a principle of such general predominance throughout the higher classes of society, and to suggest to the serious inquirer some practical hints for its regulation and control. Since the principle too, of which we have been treating, is one of the most ordinary modifications of pride, the discussion may also serve in some degree to supply a manifest deficiency; a deficiency to be ascribed to the fear of trespassing too far on the reader's patience, in having but slightly touched on the allowed prevalence of that master-passion, and on the allowed neglect of its opposite, humility.

SECT. IV.

The generally prevailing Error, of substituting amiable Tempers and useful Lives in the place of Religion, stated and confuted; with hints to real Christians.

There is another practical error very generally prevalent, the effects of which are highly injurious to the cause of religion; and which, in particular, is often brought forward when, upon Christian principles, any advocates for Christianity would press the practice of Christian virtues.

The error to which we allude is that of exaggerating the merit of certain amiable and useful qualities, and of considering them as of themselves sufficient to compensate for the want of the supreme love and fear of God.

It seems to be an opinion pretty generally prevalent, that kindness and sweetness of temper, sympathising, benevolent, and generous affections, attention to what in the world's estimation are the domestic, relative, and social duties, and, above all, a life of general activity and usefulness, may well be allowed in our imperfect state, to make up for the defect of what, in strict propriety of speech, is termed religion.

Many indeed will unreservedly declare, and more will hint the opinion, that “the difference between the qualities above mentioned and religion is rather a verbal or logical than a real and essential difference; for, in truth, what are they but religion in substance, if not in name? Is it not the great end of religion, and in particular the glory of Christianity, to extinguish the malignant passions; to curb the violence, to control the appetites, and to smooth the asperities of man; to make us compassionate and kind and forgiving one to another; to make us good husbands, good fathers, good friends, and to render us active and useful in the discharge of the relative, social, and civil duties? We do not deny that, in the general mass of society, and particularly in the lower orders, such conduct and tempers cannot be diffused and maintained by any other medium than that of religion. But if the end be effected, surely it is only unnecessary refinement to dispute about the means. It is even to forget your own principles, and to refuse its just place to solid practical virtue, while you assign too high a value to speculative opinions.”

Thus a fatal distinction is admitted between morality and religion: a great and desperate error, of which it is the more necessary to take notice, because many who would condemn, as too strong, the language in which this opinion is sometimes openly avowed, are yet more or less tinged with the notion itself; and, under the habitual and almost unperceived influence of this beguiling suggestion, are vainly so-lacing their imaginations, and repressing their well-grounded fears concerning their own state; and are also quieting their just solicitude concerning the spiritual condition of others, and soothing themselves in the neglect of friendly endeavours for their improvement.

There can hardly be a stronger proof of the cursory and superficial views, with which men are apt to satisfy themselves in religious concerns, than the prevalence of the opinion here in question; the falsehood and sophistry of which must be acknowledged by any one who, admitting the authority of Scripture, will examine it with ever so little seriousness and impartiality of mind.

Appealing indeed to a less strict standard, it would not be difficult to show, that the moral worth of these sweet and benevolent tempers, and of these useful lives, is apt to be greatly overrated. The former involuntarily gain upon our affections, and disarm our severer judgments, by their kindly, complying, and apparently disinterested nature; by their prompting men to flatter instead of mortifying our pride, to sympathise either with our joys or our sorrows, to abound in obliging attentions and offices of courtesy; by their obvious tendency to produce and maintain harmony and comfort in social and domestic life. It is not however unworthy of remark, that, from the commendations which are so generally bestowed on these qualities, and their rendering men universally acceptable and popular, there is many a false pretender to them, who gains a credit for them which he by no means deserves; in whom they are no more than the proprieties of his assumed character, or even a mask which is worn in public, only the better to conceal an opposite temper. Would you see this man of courtesy and sweetness stripped of his false covering, follow him unobserved into his family; and you shall behold, too plain to be mistaken, selfishness and spleen harassing and vexing the wretched subjects of their unmanly tyranny; as if, being released at length from their confinement, they were making up to themselves for the restraint which had been imposed on them in the world.

But where the benevolent qualities are genuine, they often deserve the name rather of amiable instincts than of moral virtues. In many cases, they imply no mental conflict, no previous discipline: they are apt to evaporate in barren sensibilities, and transitory sympathies, and indolent wishes, and unproductive declarations: they possess not that strength and energy of character which, in contempt of difficulties and dangers, produce alacrity in service, and vigour and perseverance in action. Destitute of proper firmness, they often encourage that vice and folly which it is their especial duty to repress; and it is well if, from their soft complying humour, they are not often drawn in to participate in what is wrong, as well as to connive at it. Thus their possessors are frequently, in the eye of truth and reason, bad magistrates and parents, bad friends; defective in those very qualities which give to each of these several relations its chief and appropriate value. And here it may be observed, that persons thus defective can ill establish the claim which is often preferred on their behalf, that they are free from selfishness; for, if we trace such deficiencies to their true source, they will be found to arise chiefly from indisposition to submit to a painful effort, though real goodwill commands that sacrifice, or from the fear of lessening the regard in which we are held, and the good opinion which is entertained of us.

It should further also be observed concerning these qualities, when they are not rooted in religion, that they are of a sickly and a short-lived nature, and want that hardy and vigorous temperament which is requisite for enabling them to bear without injury, or even to survive, the rude shocks and the variable and churlish seasons to which, in such a world as this, they must ever be exposed. It is only a Christian love of which it is the character, that "it suffereth long, and yet is kind;" "that it is not easily provoked, that it beareth all things, and endureth all things." In the spring of youth indeed, the blood flows freely through the veins: we are flushed with health and confidence; hope is young and ardent, our desires are unsated, and whatever we see has the grace of novelty; we are the more disposed to be goodnatured, because we are pleased; pleased, because universally well received. Wherever we cast our eyes, we see some face of friendship and love and gratulation. All nature smiles around us. In this season the amiable tempers of which we have been speaking naturally spring up. The soil suits, the climate favours them. They appear to shoot forth vigorously, and blossom in gay luxuriance. To the superficial eye, all is fair and flourishing; we anticipate the fruits of autumn, and promise ourselves an ample produce. But by and by the sun scorches, the frost nips, the winds rise, the rains descend; our golden dreams are blasted, all our fond expectations are no more. Our youthful efforts, let it be supposed, have been successful; and we rise to wealth or eminence. A kind flexible temper and popular manners have produced in us, as they are too apt, a youth of easy social dissipation, and unproductive idleness; and we are overtaken too late by the consciousness of having wasted that time which cannot be recalled, and those opportunities which we cannot now recover. We sink into disregard and obscurity, when, there being a call for qualities of more energy, indolent goodnature must fall back. We are thrust out of notice by accident or misfortunes. We are left behind by those with whom we started on equal terms, and who, originally perhaps having less pretensions and fewer advantages, have greatly outstripped us in the race of honour: and their having gotten before us is often the more galling, because it appears to us, and perhaps with reason, to have been chiefly owing to a generous easy goodnatured humour on our part, which disposed us to allow them at first to pass by us without jealousy, and led us to give place, without a struggle, to their more lofty pretensions. Thus we suffered them quietly to occupy a station to which originally we had as fair a claim as they; but, this station being once tamely surrendered, we have forfeited it for ever. Meanwhile our awkward and vain endeavours to recover it—at the same time that they show us to be not less wanting in self-knowledge and composure in our riper years than in our younger we had been destitute of exertion—serve only to make our inferiority more manifest, and to bring our discontent into the fuller notice of an ill-natured world, which, however, not unjustly condemns and ridicules our misplaced ambition.

It may be sufficient to have hinted at a few of the vicissitudes of advancing life; let the reader's own mind fill up the catalogue. Now the bosom is no longer cheerful and placid; and if the countenance preserve its exterior character, this is no longer the honest expression of the heart. Prosperity and luxury, gradually extinguishing sympathy, and puffing up with pride, harden and debase the soul. In other instances, shame secretly clouds, and remorse begins to sting, and suspicion to corrode, and jealousy and envy to embitter. Disappointed hopes, unsuccessful competitions, and frustrated pursuits, sour and irritate the temper. A little personal experience of the selfishness of mankind damps our generous warmth and kind affections; reproving the prompt sensibility and unsuspecting simplicity of our earlier years. Above all, ingratitude sickens the heart, and chills and thickens the very life's blood of benevolence,—till at length our youthful Nero, soft and susceptible, becomes a hard and cruel tyrant; and our youthful Timon, the gay, the generous, the beneficent, is changed into a cold, sour, silent misanthrope.

And as in the case of amiable tempers, so in that also of what are called useful lives, it must be confessed that their intrinsic worth, arguing still merely on principles of reason, is apt to be greatly overrated. They are often the result of a disposition naturally bustling and active, which delights in motion, and finds its labour more than repaid, either by the very pleasure which it takes in its employments, or by the credit which it derives from them. Nay, further; if it be granted that religion tends in general to produce usefulness, particularly in the lower orders, who compose a vast majority of every society; and, therefore, that these irreligious men of useful lives are rather exceptions to the general rule; it must at least be confessed, that they are so far useless, or even positively mischievous, that they either neglect to encourage, or actually discourage, that principle which is the great operative spring of usefulness in the bulk of mankind.

Thus it might well perhaps be questioned, estimating these men by their own standard, whether the particular good in this case is not more than counterbalanced by the general evil; still more if, their conduct being brought to a strict account, they should be charged, as they justly ought, with the loss of the good, which, if they had manifestly and avowedly acted from a higher principle, might have been produced, not only directly in themselves, but indirectly and remotely in others, from the extended efficacy of a religious example. They may be compared, not unaptly, to persons whom some peculiarity of constitution enables to set at defiance those established rules of living which must be observed by the world at large. These healthy debauchees, however they may plead in their defence that they do themselves no injury, would probably, but for their excesses, have both enjoyed their health better, and preserved it longer, as well as have turned it to better account; and it may at least be urged against them, that they disparage the laws of temperance, and fatally betray others into the breach of them, by affording an instance of their being transgressed with impunity.

But were the merit of these amiable qualities greater than it is, and though it were not liable to the exceptions which have been alleged against it, yet could they be in no degree admitted as a compensation for the want of the supreme love and fear of God, and of a predominant desire to promote his glory. The observance of one commandment, however clearly and forcibly enjoined, cannot make up for the neglect of another, which is enjoined with equal clearness and equal force. To allow this plea in the present instance, would be to permit men to abrogate the first table of the law on condition of their obeying the second. But religion suffers not any such composition of duties. It is on the very self-same miserable principle, that some have thought to atone for a life of injustice and rapine by the strictness of their religious observances. If the former class of men can plead the diligent discharge of their duties to their fellow-creatures, the latter will urge that of theirs to God. We easily see the falsehood of the plea in the latter case; and it is only self-deceit and partiality which prevent its being equally visible in the former. Yet so it is; such is the unequal measure, if I may be allowed the expression, which we deal out to God, and to each other. It would justly and universally be thought false confidence in the religious thief or the religious adulterer, (to admit, for the sake of argument, such a solecism in terms,) to solace himself with the firm persuasion of the divine favour; but it will, to many, appear hard and precise, to deny this firm persuasion of divine approbation to the avowedly irreligious man of social and domestic usefulness.

Will it here be urged, that the writer is not doing justice to his opponent's argument; which is not, that irreligious men of useful lives may be excused for neglecting their duties towards God, in consideration of their exemplary discharge of their duties towards their fellow-creatures; but that, in performing the latter, they perform the former, virtually and substantially, if not in name?

Can, then, our opponent deny, that the Holy Scriptures are in nothing more full and unequivocal, than in requiring us supremely to love and fear God, and to worship and serve him continually with humble and grateful hearts; habitually to regard him as our Benefactor and Sovereign and Father, and to abound in sentiments of gratitude and loyalty and respectful affection? Can he deny that these positive precepts are rendered, if possible, still more clear, and their authority still more binding, by illustrations and indirect confirmations almost innumerable? And who, then, is that bold intruder into the counsels of infinite wisdom, who in palpable contempt of these precise commands, thus illustrated also and confirmed, will dare to maintain, that, knowing the intention with which they were primarily given, and the ends they were ultimately designed to produce, he may innocently neglect or violate their plain obligations, on the plea that he conforms himself, though in a different manner, to this primary intention, and produces, though by different means, these real and ultimate ends?

This mode of arguing (to say nothing of its insolent profaneness) would, if once admitted, afford (as has been already shown) the means of refining away by turns every moral obligation.

But this miserable sophistry deserves not that we should spend so much time in the refutation of it. To discern its fallaciousness requires not acuteness of understanding, so much as a little common honesty. "There is indeed no surer mark of a false and hollow heart than a disposition thus to quibble away the clear injunctions of duty and conscience."* It is the wretched resource of a disingenuous mind, endeavouring to escape from convictions before which it cannot stand, and to evade obligations which it dares not disavow.

The arguments which have been adduced would surely be sufficient to disprove the extravagant pretensions of the qualities under consideration, though those qualities were perfect in their nature. But they are not perfect. On the contrary, they are radically defective and corrupt; they are a body without a soul; they want the vital actuating principle, or rather they are animating and actuated by a false principle. Christianity, let me avail myself of the very words of a friend† in maintaining her argument, is “a religion of motives.” That only is Christian practice which flows from Christian principles; and none else will be admitted as such by Him who will be obeyed, as well as worshipped, “in spirit and in truth.”

* See Smith's Theory of Moral Sentiments.

† The writer hopes, that the work to which he is referring is so well known, that he needs scarcely name Mrs. H. More.

This also is a position, of which, in our intercourse with our fellow-creatures, we clearly discern the justice, and universally admit the force. Though we have received a benefit at the hands of any one, we scarcely feel grateful, if we do not believe the intention towards us to have been friendly. Have we served any one from motives of kindness, and is a return of service made to us, we hardly feel ourselves worthily requited except that return be dictated by gratitude. We should think ourselves rather injured than obliged by it, if it were merely prompted by a proud unwillingness to continue in our debt.* What husband, or what father, not absolutely dead to every generous feeling, would be satisfied with a wife or a child who, though he could not charge them with any actual breach of their respective obligations, should yet confessedly perform them from a cold sense of duty, in place of the quickening energies of conjugal and filial affection? What an insult would it be to such a one, to tell him gravely that he had no reason to complain!

The unfairness with which we suffer ourselves to reason in matters of religion is nowhere more striking than in the instance before us. It were perhaps not unnatural to suppose, that, as we cannot see into each other's bosoms, and have no sure way of judging any one's internal principles but by his external actions, it would have grown into an established rule, that, when the latter were unobjectionable, the former were not to be questioned; and, on the other hand, that, in reference to a Being who searches the heart, our motives, rather than our external actions, would be granted to be the just objects of inquiry. But we exactly reverse these natural principles of reasoning. In the case of our fellow-creatures, the motive is that which we principally enquire after and regard; but, in the case of our supreme Judge, from whom no secrets are hid, we suffer ourselves to believe, that internal principles may be dispensed with, if the external action be performed!

* See Smith's Theory of Moral Sentiments.

Let us not however be supposed ready to concede, in contradiction to what has been formerly contended, that where the true motive is wanting, the external actions themselves will not generally betray the defect. Who is there that will not confess, in the instance of a wife and a child who should discharge their respective obligations merely from a cold sense of duty, that the inferiority of their actuating principle would not be confined to its nature, but would be discoverable also in its effects? Who is there that does not feel that these domestic services, thus robbed of their vital spirit, would be so debased and degraded in our estimation, as to become, not barely lifeless and uninteresting, but even distasteful and loathsome? Who will deny that these would be performed in fuller measure, with more wakeful and unwearied attention, as well as with more heart, where, with the same sense of duty, the enlivening principle of affection should also be associated?

The enemies of religion are sometimes apt to compare the irreligious man, of a temper naturally sweet and amiable, with the religious man of natural roughness and severity; the irreligious man of natural activity, with the religious man who is naturally indolent; and thence to draw their inferences. But this mode of reasoning is surely unjust. If they would argue the question fairly, they should make their comparisons between persons of similar natural qualities, and not in one or two examples, but in a mass of instances. They would then be compelled to confess the efficacy of religion in heightening the benevolence, and increasing the usefulness of men; and to admit, that, even supposing a genuine benevolence of disposition, and persevering usefulness of life, occasionally to exist where the religious principle is wanting, yet true religion (which confessedly implants those qualities where before they had no place) would have given to those very characters in whom they do exist, additional force in the same direction. It would have rendered the amiable more amiable, the useful more useful, with fewer inconsistencies, with less abatement.

Let true Christians meanwhile be ever mindful, that they are loudly called upon to make this argument still more clear, these positions still less questionable. You are everywhere commanded to be tender and sympathetic, diligent and useful: and it is the character of that "wisdom from above," in which you are to be proficients, that it "is gentle and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits." Could the efficacy of Christianity, in softening the heart, be denied by those who saw, in the instance of the great apostle of the Gentiles, that it was able to transform a bigoted, furious, and cruel persecutor, into an almost unequalled example of candour and gentleness and universal tenderness and love? Could its spirit of active beneficence be denied by those who saw its divine Author so diligent and unwearied in his benevolent labours as to justify the compendious description which was given of him by a personal witness of his exertions, that he “went about doing good?” Imitate these blessed examples: so shall you vindicate the honour of your profession, and “put to silence the ignorance of foolish men;” so shall you obey those divine injunctions of adorning the doctrine of Christ, and of “letting your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.” Beat the world at its own best weapons. Let your love be more affectionate, your mildness less open to irritation, your diligence more laborious, your activity more wakeful and persevering. Consider sweetness of temper and activity of mind, if they naturally belong to you, as talents of special worth and utility, for which you will have to give account. Carefully watch against whatever might impair them, cherish them with constant assiduity, keep them in continual exercise, and direct them to their noblest ends. The latter of these qualities renders it less difficult, and therefore more encumbent on you, to be ever abounding in the work of the Lord; and to be copious in the production of that species of good fruit, of which mankind in general will be most ready to allow the excellence, because they best understand its nature. In your instance, the solid substance of Christian practice is easily susceptible of that high and beautiful polish, which may attract the attention, and extort the admiration, of a careless and undiscerning world, so slow to notice, and so backward to acknowledge, intrinsic worth, when concealed under a less sightly exterior. Know then, and value as you ought, the honourable office which is especially devolved on you. Let it be your acceptable service to recommend the discredited cause, and sustain the fainting interests of religion, to furnish to her friends matter of sound and obvious argument, and of honest triumph; and if your best endeavours cannot conciliate, to refute at least and confound her enemies.

If, on the other hand, you are conscious that you are naturally rough and austere, that disappointments have soured, or prosperity has elated you, or that habits of command have rendered you quick in expression, and impatient of contradiction,—or if, from whatever other cause, you have contracted an unhappy peevishness of temper, or asperity of manners, or harshness and severity of language, (remember that these defects are by no means incompatible with an aptness to perform services of substantial kindness),—if nature has been confirmed by habit, till at length your soul seems thoroughly tinctured with these evil dispositions, yet do not despair. Remember that the divine agency is promised “to take away the heart of stone, and give a heart of flesh,” of which it is the natural property to be tender and impressible. Pray then, earnestly and perseveringly, that the blessed aid of divine grace may operate effectually on your behalf. Beware of acquiescing in the evil tempers which have been condemned, under the idea that they are the ordinary imperfections of the best of men; that they show themselves only in little instances; that they are only occasional, hasty, and transient effusions, when you are taken off your guard; the passing shade of your mind, and not the settled colour. Beware of excusing or allowing them in yourself, under the notion of warm zeal for the cause of religion and virtue, which you perhaps own is now and then apt to carry you into somewhat over-great severity of judgment, or sharpness in reproof. Listen not to these, or any other such flattering excuses, which your own heart will be but too ready to suggest to you. Scrutinize yourself rather with rigorous strictness; and where there is so much room for self-deceit, call in the aid of some faithful friend, and, unbosoming yourself to him without concealment, ask his impartial and unreserved opinion of your behaviour and condition. Our unwillingness to do this often betrays to others, indeed it not seldom discovers to ourselves, that we entertain a secret distrust of our own character and conduct. Instead also of extenuating to yourself the criminality of the vicious tempers under consideration, strive to impress your mind deeply with a sense of it. For this end, often consider seriously, that these rough and churlish tempers are a direct contrast to the “meekness and gentleness of Christ;” and that Christians are strongly and repeatedly enjoined to copy after their great Model in these particulars, and to be themselves patterns of “mercy, and kindness, and humbleness of mind, and meekness, and long-suffering.” They are to “put away all bitterness and wrath and anger and clamour and evil speaking,” not only “being ready to every good work, but being gentle unto all men," "showing all meekness unto all men," "forbearing, forgiving, tender-hearted." Remember the apostle's declaration, that "if any man bridleth not his tongue, he only seemeth to be religious, and deceiveth his own heart;" and that it is one of the characters of that love, without which all pretensions to the name of Christian are but vain, that "it doth not behave itself unseemly." Consider how much these acrimonious tempers must break in upon the peace, and destroy the comfort, of those around you. Remember also that the honour of your Christian profession is at stake, and be solicitous not to discredit it—justly dreading lest you should disgust those whom you ought to conciliate; and, by conveying an unfavourable impression of your principles and character, should incur the guilt of putting an "offence in your brother's way," thereby "hindering the gospel of Christ,"—the advancement of which should be your daily and assiduous care.

Thus having come to the full knowledge of your disease, and to a just impression of its malignity, strive against it with incessant watchfulness. Guard with the most jealous circumspection against its breaking forth into act. Force yourself to abound in little offices of courtesy and kindness; and you shall gradually experience, in the performance of these, a pleasure hitherto unknown, and awaken in yourself the dormant principles of sensibility. But take not up with external amendment; guard against a false show of sweetness of disposition; and remember that the Christian is not to be satisfied with the world's superficial courtliness of demeanour, but that his "love is to be without dissimulation." Examine carefully, whether the unchristian tempers, which you would eradicate, are not maintained in vigour by selfishness and pride; and strive to subdue them effectually, by extirpating the roots from which they derive their nutriment. Accustom yourself to endeavour to look attentively upon a careless and inconsiderate world, which, while it is in such imminent peril, is so ignorant of its danger. Dwell upon this affecting scene, till it has excited your pity; and this pity, while it melts the mind to Christian love, shall insensibly produce a temper of habitual sympathy and softness. By means like these, perseveringly used in constant dependence on divine aid, you may confidently hope to make continual progress. Among men of the world, a youth of softness and sweetness will often, as we formerly remarked, harden into insensibility, and sharpen into moroseness. But it is the office of Christianity to reverse this order. It is pleasing to witness this blessed renovation—to see, as life advances, asperities gradually smoothing down, and austerities mellowing away; while the subject of this happy change experiences within, increasing measures of the comfort which he diffuses around him; and, feeling the genial influences of that heavenly flame which can thus give life and warmth and action to what had been hitherto rigid and insensible, looks up with gratitude to Him who has shed abroad this principle of love in his heart:

Miraturque novas frondes et non sua poma.

Let it not be thought that, in the foregoing discussion, the amiable and useful qualities, where they are not prompted and governed by a principle of religion, have been spoken of in too disparaging terms.

Nor would I be understood as unwilling to concede to those who are living in the exercise of them, their proper tribute of commendation: Inest sua gratia. Of such persons it must be said, in the language of Scripture, "they have their reward." They have it in the inward complacency which a sweet temper seldom fails to inspire; in the comforts of the domestic or social circle; in the pleasure which, from the constitution of our nature, accompanies pursuit and action. They are always beloved in private, and generally respected in public life. But when devoid of religion, if the word of God be not a fable, "they cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven." True practical Christianity (never let it be forgotten) consists in devoting the heart and life to God; in being supremely and habitually governed by a desire to know, and a disposition to fulfill his will, and in endeavouring, under the influence of these motives, to "live to his glory." Where these essential requisites are wanting, however amiable the character may be, however creditable and respectable among men—yet, as it possesses not the grand distinguishing essence, it must not be complimented with the name of Christianity. This, however, when the external decorums of religion are not violated, must commonly be a matter between God and a man's own conscience; and we ought never to forget how strongly we are enjoined to be candid and liberal in judging of the motives of others, while we are strict in scrutinizing, and severe in questioning our own. And this strict scrutiny is nowhere more necessary, because there is nowhere more room for the operation of self-deceit. We are all extremely prone to lend ourselves to the good opinion which, however falsely, is entertained of us by others; and though we at first confusedly suspect, or even indubitably know, that their esteem is unfounded, and their praises undeserved, and that they would have thought and spoken of us very differently, if they had discerned our secret motives, or had been accurately acquainted with all the circumstances of our conduct; we gradually suffer ourselves to adopt their judgment of us, and at length feel that we are in some sort injured, or denied our due, when these false commendations are contradicted or withheld.

Without the most constant watchfulness, and the most close and impartial self-examination, irreligious people of amiable tempers, and still more those of useful lives, from the general popularity of their character, will be particularly liable to become the dupes of this propensity. Nor is it they only who have here need to be on their guard; men of real religion will also do well to watch against this delusion. There is, however, another danger to which these are still more exposed, and against which it is the rather necessary to warn them, because of our having insisted so strongly on their being bound to be diligent in the discharge of the active duties of life. In their endeavours to fulfill this obligation, let them particularly beware, lest, setting out on right principles, they insensibly lose them in the course of their progress; lest, engaging originally in the business and bustle of the world, from a sincere and earnest desire to promote the glory of God, their minds should become so heated and absorbed in the pursuit of their object, as that the true motive of action should either altogether cease to be an habitual principle, or should at least lose much of its life and vigour; and lest, their thoughts and affections being engrossed by temporal concerns, their sense of the reality of “unseen things” should fade away, and they should lose their relish for the employments and offices of religion.

The Christian’s path is beset with dangers. On the one hand, he justly dreads an inactive and unprofitable life; on the other, he no less justly trembles for the loss of that spiritual-mindedness which is the very essence and power of his profession.—This is not quite the place for the full discussion of the difficult topic now before us: and if it were, the writer of these sheets is too conscious of his own incompetency, not to be desirous of asking, rather than of giving, advice respecting it. Yet, as it is a matter which has often engaged his most serious consideration, and has been the frequent subject of his anxious inquiry into the writings and opinions of far better instructors, he will venture to deliver a few words on it, offering them with unaffected diffidence.

Does, then, the Christian discover in himself, judging not from accidental and occasional feelings, (on which little stress is either way to be laid,) but from the permanent and habitual temper of his mind, a settled, and, still more, a growing coldness and indisposition towards the considerations and offices of religion,—and has he reason to apprehend that this coldness and indisposition are owing to his being engaged too much or too earnestly in worldly business, or to his being too keen in the pursuit of worldly objects,—let him carefully examine the state of his own heart, and seriously and impartially survey the circumstances of his situation in life ; humbly praying to the Father of light and mercy, that he may be enabled to see his way clearly in this difficult emergency. If he finds himself pursuing wealth, or dignity, or reputation, with earnestness and solicitude : if these things engage many of his thoughts ; if his mind naturally and inadvertently runs out into contemplations of them ; if success in these respects greatly gladdens, and disappointments dispirit and distress his mind, he has but too plain grounds for self-condemnation. “ No man can serve two masters.” The world is evidently in possession of his heart ; and it is no wonder that he finds himself dull, or rather dead, to the impression and enjoyment of spiritual things.

But though the marks of predominant estimation and regard for earthly things be much less clear and determinate, yet, if the object which he is pursuing be one which, by its attainment, would bring him a considerable accession of riches, station, or honour, let him soberly and fairly question and examine, whether the pursuit be warrantable : here also, asking the advice of some judicious friend ; his backwardness to do which, in instances like these, should justly lead him to distrust the reasonableness of the schemes which he is prosecuting. In such a case as this, we have good cause to distrust ourselves. Though the inward hope, that we are chiefly prompted by a desire to promote the glory of our Maker, and the happiness of our fellow-creatures, by increasing our means of usefulness, may suggest itself to allay our suspicions, yet let it not altogether remove them. It is not improbable, that, beneath this plausible mask, we conceal, more successfully perhaps from ourselves than from others, an inordinate attachment to the pomps and transitory distinctions of this life; and as this attachment gains the ascendancy, it will ever be found, that our perception and feeling of the supreme excellence of heavenly things will proportionably subside.

But when the consequences which would follow from the success of our worldly pursuits do not render them so questionable as in the case we have been just considering, yet, having such good reason to believe that there is somewhere a flaw, could we but discern it, let us carefully scrutinize the whole of our conduct, in order to discover whether we may not be living either in the breach or in the omission of some known duty; and whether it may not, therefore, have pleased God to withdraw from us the influence of his Holy Spirit; particularly enquiring, whether the duties of self-examination, of secret and public prayer, the reading of the Holy Scriptures, and the other prescribed means of grace, have not been either wholly intermitted at their proper seasons, or at least been performed with precipitation or distraction? And if we find reason to believe, that the allotment of time which it would be most for our spiritual improvement to assign to our religious offices, is often broken in upon and curtailed, let us be extremely backward to admit excuses for such interruptions and abridgments. It is more than probable, for many obvious reasons, that even our worldly affairs themselves will not, on the long run, go on the better for encroaching upon those hours which ought to be dedicated to the more immediate service of God, and to the cultivation of the inward principles of religion. Our hearts at least, and our conduct, will soon exhibit proofs of the sad effects of this fatal negligence. They who, in a crazy vessel, navigate a sea wherein are shoals and currents innumerable, if they would keep their course, or reach their port in safety, must carefully repair the smallest injuries, and often throw out their line, and take their observations. In the voyage of life also, the Christian who would not make shipwreck of his faith, while he is habitually watchful and provident, must often make it his express business to look into his state, and ascertain his progress.

But, to resume my subject, let us, when engaged in this important scrutiny, impartially examine ourselves, whether the worldly objects which engross us are all of them such as properly belong to our profession, or station, or circumstances in life; which therefore we could not neglect with a good conscience. If they be, let us consider whether they do not consume a larger share of our time than they really require; and whether, by not trifling over our work, by deducting somewhat which might be spared from our hours of relaxation, or by some other little management, we might not fully satisfy their just claims, and yet have an increased overplus of leisure to be devoted to the offices of religion.

But if we deliberately and honestly conclude that we ought not to give these worldly objects less of our time, let us endeavour at least to give them less of our hearts; striving, that the settled frame of our desires and affections may be more spiritual, and that, in the motley intercourses of life, we may constantly retain a more lively sense of the Divine presence, and a stronger impression of the reality of unseen things; thus corresponding with the Scripture description of true Christians,—“walking by faith, and not by sight, and having our conversation in heaven.”

Above all, let us guard against the temptation, to which we shall certainly be exposed, of lowering down our views to our state, instead of endeavouring to rise to the level of our views. Let us rather determine to know the worst of our case, and strive to be suitably affected with it; not forward to speak peace to ourselves, but patiently carrying about with us a deep conviction of our backwardness and inaptitude to religious duties, and a just sense of our great weakness and numerous infirmities. This cannot be an unbecoming temper, in those who are commanded to “work out their salvation with fear and trembling.” It prompts to constant and earnest prayer. It produces that sobriety, and lowliness, and tenderness of mind, that meekness of demeanour and circumspection in conduct, which are such eminent characteristics of the true Christian.

Nor is it a state devoid of consolation. “O tarry thou the Lord’s leisure; be strong, and he shall comfort thy heart.”—“They that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength.”—“Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted.” These divine assurances sooth and encourage the Christian’s disturbed and dejected mind, and insensibly diffuse a holy composure. The tint may be solemn, nay, even melancholy, but it is mild and grateful. The tumult of his soul has subsided, and he is possessed by complacency and hope and love. If a sense of undeserved kindness fill his eyes with tears, they are tears of reconciliation and joy; while a generous ardour springing up within him, sends him forth to his worldly labours “fervent in spirit;” resolving, through the divine aid, to be henceforth more diligent and exemplary in living to the glory of God, and longing meanwhile for that blessed time, when, “being freed from the bondage of corruption,” he shall be enabled to render to his heavenly Benefactor more pure and acceptable service.

After having discussed so much at large the whole question concerning amiable tempers in general, it may be scarcely necessary to dwell upon that particular class of them which belongs to the head of generous emotions, or of exquisite sensibility. To these, almost all that has been said above is strictly applicable; to which it may be added, that the persons in whom the latter qualities most abound, are often far from conducing to the peace and comfort of their nearest connexions. These qualities indeed may be rendered highly useful instruments, when enlisted into the service of religion. But we ought to except against them the more strongly when not under her control; because there is still greater danger than in the former case, that persons in whom they abound may be flattered into a false opinion of themselves by the excessive commendations often paid to them by others, and by the beguiling complacencies of their own minds, which are apt to be puffed up with a proud though secret consciousness of their own superior acuteness and sensibility. But it is the less requisite to enlarge on this topic, because it has been well discussed by many who have unfolded the real nature of these fascinating qualities; who have well remarked, that, though showy and apt to catch the eye, they are of a flimsy and perishable fabric, and not of that substantial and durable texture, which, while it imparts permanent warmth and comfort, will long preserve its more sober honours, and stand the wear and tear of life, and the vicissitudes of seasons. It has been shown, that these qualities often fail us when most we want their aid; that their possessors can solace themselves with their imaginary exertions in behalf of ideal misery, and yet shrink from the labours of active benevolence, or retire with disgust from the homely forms of real poverty and wretchedness. In fine, the superiority of true Christian charity, and of plain practical beneficence, has been ably vindicated; and the school of Rousseau has been forced to yield to the school of Christ, when the question has been concerning the best means of promoting the comfort of family life, or the temporal wellbeing of society.*

* While all are worthy of blame who, to qualities like these, have assigned a more exalted place than to religious and moral principle—there is one writer who, eminently culpable in this respect, deserves, on another account, still severer reprehension. Really possessed of powers to explore and touch the finest strings of the human heart, and bound by his sacred profession to devote those powers to the service of religion and virtue, he everywhere discovers a studious solicitude to excite indecent ideas. We turn away our eyes with disgust from open immodesty: but even this is less mischievous than that more measured style which excites impure images without shocking us by the grossness of the language. Never was delicate sensibility proved to be more distinct from plain practical benevolence than in the writings of the author to whom I allude. Instead of employing his talents for the benefit of his fellow-creatures, they were applied to the pernicious purposes of corrupting the national taste, and of lowering the standard of manners and morals. The tendency of his writings is to vitiate that purity of mind intended by Providence as the companion and preservative of youthful virtue; and to

SECT. V.

Some other grand defects in the practical system of the bulk of Nominal Christians.

In the imperfect sketch which has been drawn of the religion of the bulk of nominal Christians, their fundamental error respecting the essential nature of Christianity has been discussed, and traced into some of its many mischievous consequences. Several of their particular misconceptions and allowed defects have also been pointed out and illustrated. It may not be improper to close the survey by noticing some others, for the existence of which we may now appeal to almost every part of the preceding delineation.

In the first place, then, there appears throughout, both in the principles and allowed conduct of the bulk of nominal Christians, a most inadequate idea of the guilt and evil of sin. We everywhere find reason to remark, that religion is suffered to dwindle away into a mere matter of police. Hence the guilt of actions is estimated, not by the proportion in which, according to Scripture, they are offensive to God, but by that in which they are injurious to society. Murder, theft, fraud in all its shapes, and some species of lying, are manifestly, and in an emiproduce, if the expression may be permitted, a morbid sensibility in the perception of indecency. An imagination exercised in this discipline is never clean, but seeks for and discovers something indelicate in the most common phrases and actions of ordinary life. If the general style of writing and conversation were to be formed on that model, to which Sterne used his utmost endeavours to conciliate the minds of men, there is no estimating the effects which would soon be produced on the manners and morals of the age.

ment degree, injurious to social happiness. How different accordingly, in the moral scale, is the place they hold, from that which is assigned to idolatry, to general irreligion, to swearing, drinking, fornication, lasciviousness, sensuality, excessive dissipation; and, in particular circumstances, to pride, wrath, malice, and revenge!

Indeed, several of the above mentioned vices are held to be grossly criminal in the lower ranks, because manifestly ruinous to their temporal interests; but in the higher, they are represented as “losing half their evil by losing all their grossness,” as flowing naturally from great prosperity, from the excess of gaiety and good humour; and they are accordingly “regarded with but a small degree of disapprobation, and censured very slightly or not at all.”*—“Non meus hic sermo est.” These are the remarks of authors, who have surveyed the stage of human life with more than ordinary observation; one of whom, in particular, cannot be suspected of having been misled by religious prejudices, to form a judgment of the superior orders too unfavourable and severe.

Will these positions however be denied? Will it be maintained that there is not the difference already stated, in the moral estimation of these different classes of vices? Will it be said, that the one class is indeed more generally restrained, and more severely punished by human laws, because more properly cognizable by human judicatures, and more directly at war with the wellbeing of society; but that, when brought before the tribunal of internal opinion, they are condemned with equal rigour?

* See Smith on the Wealth of Nations, vol. iii.

Facts may be denied, and charges laughed out of countenance ; but where the general sentiment and feeling of mankind are in question, our common language is often the clearest and most impartial witness ; and the conclusions thus furnished are not to be parried by wit, or eluded by sophistry. In the present case, our ordinary modes of speech furnish sufficient matter for the determination of the argument ; and abundantly prove our disposition, to consider as matters of small account such sins as are not held to be injurious to the community. We invent for them diminutive and qualifying terms, which, if not, as in the common uses of language,* to be admitted as signs of approbation and goodwill, must at least be confessed to be proofs of our tendency to regard them with palliation and indulgence. Freethinking, gallantry, jollity,† and a thousand similar phrases, might be adduced as instances. But it is worthy of remark, that no such soft and qualifying terms are in use, for expressing the smaller degrees of theft, or fraud, or forgery, or any other of those offences which are committed by men against their fellow-creatures, and in the suppression of which we are interested by our regard to our temporal concerns.

The charge which we are arguing is indeed undeniable. In the case of any question of honour or of moral honesty, we are sagacious in discerning, and inexorable in judging the offence. No allowance is made for the suddenness of surprise, or the strength of temptations. One single failure is presumed to imply the absence of the moral or honourable principle. The memory is retentive on these occasions, and the man's character is blasted for life. Here even the mere suspicion of having once offended can scarcely be got over: "There is an awkward story about that man, which must be explained before he and I can become acquainted." But in the case of sins against God, there is no such watchful jealousy, none of this rigorous logic. A man may go on in the frequent commission of known sins, yet no such inference is drawn respecting the absence of the religious principle. On the contrary, we say of him, that "though his conduct be a little incorrect, his principles are untouched;"—that he has a good heart: and such a man may go quietly through life, with the titles of a mighty worthy creature, and a very good Christian.

* See the Grammarians and Dialecticians on the Diminutives of the Italian and other languages.

† Many more might be added, such as a good fellow, a good companion, a libertine, a little free, a little loose in talk, wild, gay, jovial, being no man's enemy but his own, &c., above all, having a good heart.

But in the word of God actions are estimated by a far less accommodating standard. There we read of no little sins. Much of our Saviour's sermon on the mount, which many of the class we are condemning affect highly to admire, is expressly pointed against so dangerous a misconception. There no such distinction is made between the rich and the poor. No notices are to be traced of one scale of morals for the higher, and of another for the lower classes of society. Nay, the former are expressly guarded against any such vain imagination; and are distinctly warned, that their condition in life is the more dangerous, because of the more abundant temptations to which it exposes them. Idolatry, fornication, lasciviousness, drunkenness, revelings, inordinate affection, are, by the apostle, likewise classed with theft and murder, and with what we hold in even still greater abomination; and concerning them all it is pronounced alike, that “they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God.”

In truth, the instance which we have lately specified, of the loose system of these nominal Christians, betrays a fatal absence of the principle which is the very foundation of all religion. Their slight notions of the guilt and evil of sin discover an utter want of all suitable reverence for the Divine Majesty. This principle is justly termed in Scripture, “the beginning of wisdom;” and there is perhaps no one quality which it is so much the studious endeavour of the sacred writers to impress upon the human heart.*

Sin is considered in Scripture as rebellion against the sovereignty of God, and every different act of it equally violates the law, and, if persevered in, disclaims his supremacy. To the inconsiderate and the gay, this doctrine may seem harsh, while, vainly fluttering in the sunshine of worldly prosperity, they lull themselves into a fond security. “But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night: in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up.”—“Sceing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness!” We are but an atom in the universe. Worlds upon worlds surround us, all probably full of intelligent creatures, to whom, now or hereafter, we may be a spectacle, and afford an example of the divine procedure. Who then shall take upon him to pronounce what might be the issue, if sin were suffered to pass unpunished in one corner of this universal empire? Who shall say what confusion might be the consequence, what disorder it might spread through the creation of God? Be this however as it may, the language of Scripture is clear and decisive:—"The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the people that forget God."

* Job xxviii, 28. Psalms cxi, 10. Prov. i, 7. ix, 10.

It should be carefully observed, too, that these awful denunciations of the future punishment of sin derive additional weight from this consideration, that they are represented, not merely as a judicial sentence, which, without violence to the settled order of things, might be remitted through the mere mercy of our Almighty Governor, but as arising out of the established course of nature; as happening in the way of natural consequence, just as a cause is necessarily connected with its effect; and as resulting from certain connections and relations, which rendered them suitable and becoming. It is stated, that the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan are both set up in the world, and that to the one or the other of these we must belong. "The righteous have passed from death unto life,"—"they are delivered from the power of darkness, and are translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son." They are become "the children," and "the subjects of God." While on earth, they love his day, his service, his people; they "speak good of his name;" they abound in his works. Even here they are in some degree possessed of his image; by and by it shall be perfected; they shall awake up after his "likeness," and being "heirs of eternal life," they shall receive an "inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away."

Of sinners, on the other hand, it is declared, that "they are of their father the devil;" while on earth, they are styled "his children," "his servants;" they are said "to do his works," "to hold of his side," to be "subjects of his kingdom;" at length "they shall partake his portion," when the merciful Saviour shall be changed into an avenging Judge, and shall pronounce that dreadful sentence "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

Is it possible that these declarations should not strike terror, or at least excite serious and fearful apprehensions in the lightest and most inconsiderate mind? But the imaginations of men are fatally prone to suggest to them fallacious hopes in the very face of these positive declarations. "We cannot persuade ourselves that God will in fact prove so severe." It was the very delusion to which our first parents listened: "Ye shall not surely die."

Let me ask these rash men, who are thus disposed to trifle with their immortal interests, had they lived in the antediluvian world, would they have conceived it possible that God would then execute his predicted threatening? Yet the event took place at the appointed time; the flood came and swept them all away; and this awful instance of the anger of God against sin is related in the inspired writings for our instruction. Still more to rouse us to attention, the record is impressed in indelible characters on the solid substance of the very globe we inhabit; which thus, in every country upon earth, furnishes practical attestations to the truth of the sacred writings, and to the actual accomplishment of their awful predictions. For myself I must declare, that I never can read without awe the passage in which our Saviour is speaking of the state of the world at the time of this memorable event. The wickedness of men is represented to have been great and prevalent; yet not, as we are ready to conceive, such as to interrupt the course, and shake the very frame of society. The general face of things was, perhaps, not very different from that which is exhibited in many of the European nations. It was a selfish, a luxurious, an irreligious, and an inconsiderate world. They were called, but they would not hearken; they were warned, but they would not believe: "they did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage," such is the account of one of the evangelists:—in that of another, it is stated nearly in the same words; "They were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, and knew not untill the flood came, and swept them all away."

Again we see throughout, in the system which we have been describing, a most inadequate conception of the difficulty of becoming true Christians; and an utter forgetfulness of its being the great business of life to secure our admission into heaven, and to prepare our heart for its service and enjoyments. The general notion appears to be, that, if born in a country of which Christianity is the established religion, we are born Christians. We do not therefore look out for positive evidence of our really being of that number; but, putting the onus probandi (if it may be so expressed) on the wrong side, we conceive ourselves such of course, except our title be disproved by positive evidence to the contrary. And we are so slow in giving ear to what conscience urges to us on this side; so dexterous in justifying what is clearly wrong, in palliating what we cannot justify, in magnifying the merit of what is fairly commendable, in flattering ourselves that our habits of vice are only occasional acts, and in multiplying our single acts into habits of virtue, that we must be bad indeed to be compelled to give a verdict against ourselves. Besides, having no suspicion of our state, we do not set ourselves in earnest to the work of self-examination; but only receive, in a confused and hasty way, some occasional notices of our danger, when sickness, or the loss of a friend, or the recent commission of some act of vice of greater size than ordinary, has awakened in our consciences a more than usual degree of sensibility.

Thus, by the generality, it is altogether forgotten that the Christian has a great work to execute—that of forming himself after the pattern of his Lord and Master, through the operation of the Holy Spirit of God, which is promised to our fervent prayers and diligent endeavours. Unconscious of the obstacles which impede, and of the enemies which resist their advancement, they are naturally forgetful also of the ample provision which is in store, for enabling them to surmount the one, and to conquer the other. The scriptural representations of the state of the Christian on earth, by the images of “a race,” and a “warfare;” of its being necessary to rid himself of every encumbrance which might retard him in the one, and to furnish himself with the whole armour of God for being victorious in the other, are, so far as these nominal Christians are concerned, figures of no propriety or meaning. As little have they, in correspondence with the Scripture descriptions of the feelings and language of real Christians, any idea of acquiring a relish, while on earth, for the worship and service of heaven. If the truth must be told, their notion is rather a confused idea of future gratification in heaven, in return for having put a force upon their inclinations, and endured so much religion while on earth.

But all this is only nominal Christianity, which exhibits a more inadequate image of her real excellencies than the cold copyings, by some insipid pencil, convey of the force and grace of nature, or of Raphael. In the language of Scripture, Christianity is not a geographical, but a moral term. It is not the being a native of a Christian country; it is a condition, a state; the possession of a peculiar nature, with the qualities and properties which belong to it.

Further than this; it is a state into which we are not born, but into which we must be translated; a nature which we do not inherit, but into which we are to be created anew. To the undeserved grace of God, which is promised on our use of the appointed means, we must be indebted for the attainment of this nature; and to acquire and make sure of it is that “great work of our salvation which” we are commanded to “work out with fear and trembling.” We are everywhere reminded that this is a matter of labour and difficulty, requiring continual watchfulness, and unceasing effort, and unwearied patience. Even to the very last, towards the close of a long life, consumed in active service or in cheerful suffering, we find St. Paul himself declaring that he conceived bodily self-denial and mental discipline to be indispensably necessary to his very safety. Christians, who are really worthy of the name, are represented as being "made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light;" as "waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ;" as "looking for and hastening unto the coming of the day of God." It is stated as being enough to make them happy, that "Christ should receive them to himself;" and the songs of the blessed spirits in heaven are described to be the same as those in which the servants of God on earth pour forth their gratitude and adoration.

Conscious, therefore, of the indispensable necessity, and of the arduous nature, of the service in which he is engaged, the true Christian sets himself to the work with vigour, and prosecutes it with diligence. His motto is that of the painter: "Nullus dies sine linea." Fled as it were from a country in which the plague is raging, he thinks it not enough just to pass the boundary line, but would put out of doubt his escape beyond the limits of infection. Prepared to meet with difficulties, he is not discouraged when they occur; warned of his numerous adversaries, he is not alarmed on their approach, or unprovided for encountering them. He knows that the beginnings of every new course may be expected to be rough and painful; but he is assured that the paths on which he is entering will ere long seem smoother, and become indeed "paths of pleasantness and peace."

Now, of the state of such a one, the expressions of Pilgrim and Stranger are a lively description: and all the other figures and images by which Christians are represented in Scripture, have in his case a determinate meaning and a just application. There is indeed none by which the Christian's state on earth is in the word of God more frequently imaged, or more happily illustrated, than by that of a journey: and it may not be amiss to pause for a while in order to survey it under that resemblance. The Christian is traveling on business through a strange country, in which he is commanded to execute his work with diligence, and pursue his course homeward with alacrity. The fruits which he sees by the wayside he gathers with caution; he drinks of the streams with moderation; he is thankful when the sun shines, and his way is pleasant; but if it be rough and rainy, he cares not much—he is but a traveler. He is prepared for vicissitudes; he knows that he must expect to meet with them in the stormy and uncertain climate of this world. But he is traveling to “a better country,” a country of unclouded light and undisturbed serenity. He finds also by experience, that when he has had the least of external comforts, he has always been least disposed to loiter; and if for the time it be a little disagreeable, he can solace himself with the idea of his being thereby forwarded in his course. In a less unfavourable season, he looks round him with an eye of observation; he admires what is beautiful; he examines what is curious; he receives with complacency the refreshments which are set before him, and enjoys them with thankfulness. Nor does he churlishly refuse to associate with the inhabitants of the country through which he is passing; nor, so far as he may, to speak their language, and adopt their fashions. But he suffers not pleasure, curiosity, or society, to take up too much of his time; and is still intent on transacting the business which he has to execute, and on prosecuting the journey which he is ordered to pursue. He knows also that, to the very end of life, his journey will be through a country in which he has many enemies; that his way is beset with snares; that temptations throng around him, to seduce him from his course, or check his advancement in it; that the very air disposes to drowsiness, and that therefore to the very last it will be requisite for him to be circumspect and collected. Often therefore he examines whereabouts he is, how he has got forward, and whether or not he is traveling in the right direction. Sometimes he seems to himself to make considerable progress; sometimes he advances but slowly; too often he finds reason to fear he has fallen backward in his course. Now he is cheered with hope, and gladdened by success; now he is disquieted with doubts, and damped by disappointments.—Thus while, to nominal Christians, religion is a dull uniform thing, and they have no conception of the desires and disappointments, the hopes and fears, the joys and sorrows, which it is calculated to bring into exercise—in the true Christian all is life and motion; and his great work calls forth alternately the various passions of the soul. Let it not therefore be imagined, that his is a state of unenlivened toil and hardship. His very labours are “the labours of love;” if “he has need of patience;” it is “the patience of hope;” and he is cheered in his work by the constant assurance of present support, and of final victory. Let it not be forgotten, that this is the very idea given us of happiness by one of the ablest examiners of the human mind: "A constant employment for a desirable end, with the consciousness of a continual progress." So true is the Scripture declaration, that "godliness has the promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come."

Our review of the character of the bulk of nominal Christians has exhibited abundant proofs of their allowed defectiveness in that great constituent of the true Christian character, the love of God. Many instances, in proof of this assertion, have been incidentally pointed out, and the charge is in itself so obvious, that it were superfluous to spend much time in endeavouring to establish it. Put the question fairly to the test. Concerning the proper marks and evidences of affection, there can be little dispute. Let the most candid investigator examine the character and conduct and language of the persons of whom we have been speaking; and he will be compelled to acknowledge, that, so far as love towards the supreme Being is in question, these marks and evidences are nowhere to be met with. It is in itself a decisive evidence of a contrary feeling in those nominal Christians, that they find no pleasure in the service and worship of God. Their devotional acts resemble less the freewill offerings of a grateful heart than that constrained and reluctant homage which is exacted by some hard master from his oppressed dependants, and paid with cold sullenness and slavish apprehension. It was the very charge brought by God against his ungrateful people of old, that, while they called him Sovereign and Father, they withheld from him the regards which severally belong to those respected and endearing appellations. Thus we likewise think it enough to offer to the most excellent and amiable of Beings, to our supreme and unwearied Benefactor, a dull, artificial, heartless gratitude, of which we should be ashamed in the case of a fellow-creature, who had ever so small a claim on our regard and thankfulness!

It may be of infinite use to establish in our minds a strong and habitual sense of that first and great commandment—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength." This passion, operative and vigorous in its very nature, like a master-spring, would set in motion, and maintain in action, all the complicated movements of the human soul. Soon also would it terminate many practical questions concerning the allowableness of certain compliances; questions which, with other similar difficulties, are often only the cold offspring of a spirit of reluctant submission, and cannot stand the encounter of this trying principle. If, for example, it were disputed whether or not the law of God were so strict as had been stated, in condemning the slightest infraction of its precepts; yet, when, from the precise demands of justice, the appeal shall be made to the more generous principle of love, there would be at once an end of the discussion. Fear will deter from acknowledged crimes, and self-interest will bribe to laborous services; but it is the peculiar glory, and the very characteristic of this more generous passion, to show itself in ten thousand little and undefinable acts of sedulous attention, which love alone can pay, and of which, when paid, love alone can estimate the value. Love outruns the deductions of reasoning; it scorns the refuge of casuistry; it requires not the slow process of laborious and undeniable proof, that one action would be injurious and offensive, or another beneficial or gratifying, to the object of its affection. The least hint, the slightest surmise, is sufficient to make it start from the former, and fly with eagerness to the latter.

I am well aware that I am now about to tread on very tender ground; but it would be an improper deference to the opinions and manners of the age, altogether to avoid it. There has been much argument concerning the lawfulness of theatrical amusements.* Let it be sufficient to remark, that the controversy would be short indeed, if the question were to be tried by this criterion of love to the supreme Being. If there were anything of that sensibility for the honour of God, and of that zeal in his service, which we show in behalf of our earthly friends, or of our political connections, should we seek our pleasure in that place which the debauchee, inflamed with wine, or bent on the gratification of other licentious appetites, finds most congenial to his state and temper of mind? In that place, from the neighbourhood of which (how justly termed “a school of morals” might hence alone be inferred) decorum and modesty and regularity retire, while riot and lewdness are invited to the spot, and invariably select it for their chosen residence,—where the sacred name of God is often profaned,—where sentiments are often heard with delight, and motions and gestures often applauded, which would not be tolerated in private company, but which may far exceed the utmost licence allowed in the social circle, without at all transgressing the large bounds of theatrical decorum—where, when moral principles are inculcated, they are not such as a Christian ought to cherish in his bosom, but such as it must be his daily endeavour to extirpate; not those which Scripture warrants, but those which it condemns as false and spurious, being founded in pride and ambition, and the overvaluation of human favour,—where surely, if a Christian should trust himself at all, it would be requisite for him to prepare himself with a double portion of watchfulness and seriousness of mind, instead of selecting it as the place in which he may throw off his guard, and unbend without danger! The justness of this last remark, and the general tendency of theatrical amusements, is attested by the same well-instructed master in the science of human life to whom we had before occasion to refer. By him they are recommended as the most efficacious expedient for relaxing, among any people, that “preciseness and austerity of morals,” to use his own phrase, which, under the name of holiness, it is the business of Scripture to inculcate and enforce. Nor is this position merely theoretical. The experiment was tried, and tried successfully, in a city upon the Continent,* in which it was wished to corrupt the simple morality of purer times.

* It is almost unnecessary to remark, that the word is to be understood in a large sense, as including the Opera, &c.

* Geneva.—It is worthy of remark, that the play-houses have

Let us try the question by a parallel instance.

What judgment should we form of the warmth of that man's attachment to his sovereign, who, at seasons of recreation, should seek his pleasures in scenes as ill accordant with the principle of loyalty, as those of which we have been speaking are with the genius of religion? If for this purpose he were to select the place, and frequent the amusements, to which Democrats and Jacobins* should love to resort for entertainment, and in which they should find themselves so much at home, as invariably to select the spot for their abiding habitation; where dialogue, and song, and the intelligible language of gesticulation, should be used to convey ideas and sentiments, not perhaps palpably treasonable, or falling directly within the strict precision of any legal limits, but yet palpably contrary to the spirit of monarchical government; which, further, the highest authorities had recommended as sovereign specifics for cooling the warmth, and enlarging the narrowness, of an excessive multiplied extremely in Paris since the Revolution; and that last winter there were twenty open every night, and all crowded. It should not be left unobserved, and it is seriously submitted to the consideration of those who regard the stage as a school of morals, that the pieces which were best composed, best acted, and most warmly and generally applauded, were such as abounded in touches of delicate sensibility. The people of Paris have never been imagined to be more susceptible than the generality of mankind of these emotions, and this is not the particular period when the Parisians have been commonly conceived most under their influence. (See Journal d'un Voyageur Neutre.) The author of the work expresses himself as astonished by the phenomenon, and as unable to account for it.

* The author is almost afraid of using the terms, lest they should convey an impression of party feelings, of which he wishes this book to exhibit no traces; but he here means by Democrats and Jacobins, not persons on whom party violence fastens the epithet; but persons who are really and avowedly such.

loyalty ! What opinion should we form of the delicacy of that friendship, or of the fidelity of that love, which, in relation to their respective objects, should exhibit the same contradictions ?

In truth, the hard measure, if the phrase may be pardoned, which we give to God, and the very different way in which we allow ourselves to act and speak and feel where he is concerned, from that which we require, or even practise, in the case of our fellow-creatures, is in itself the most decisive proof that the principle of the love of God, if not altogether extinct in us, is at least in the lowest possible degree of languor.

From examining the degree in which the bulk of nominal Christians are defective in the love of God, if we proceed to enquire concerning the strength of their love towards their fellow-creatures, the writer is well aware of its being generally held, that here at least they may rather challenge praise than submit to censure. And the many beneficent institutions in which this country abounds, probably above every other, whether in ancient or modern times, may be perhaps appealed to in proof of the opinion. Much of what might have been otherwise urged in the discussion of this topic, has been anticipated in the inquiry into the grounds of the extravagant estimation assigned to amiable tempers and useful lives, when unconnected with religious principle. What was then stated may serve in many cases to lower, in the present instance, the loftiness of the pretensions of these nominal Christians : and we shall hereafter have occasion to mention another consideration, of which the effect must be still further to reduce their claims. Meanwhile, let it suffice to remark, that we must not rest satisfied with merely superficial appearances, if we would form a fair estimate of the degree of purity and vigour, in which the principle of goodwill towards men warms the bosoms of the generality of professed Christians in the higher and more opulent classes in this country. In a highly polished state of society, for instance, we do not expect to find moroseness; and in an age of great profusion, though we may reflect with pleasure on those numerous charitable institutions, which are justly the honour Great Britain, we are not too hastily to infer a strong principle of internal benevolence, from liberal contributions to the relief of indigence and misery. When these contributions, indeed, are equally abundant in frugal times, or from individuals personally economical, the source from which they originate becomes less questionable. But a vigorous principle of philanthropy must not be at once conceded, on the ground of liberal benefactions to the poor, in the case of one, who, by his liberality in this respect, is curtailed in no necessary, is abridged of no luxury, is put to no trouble either of thought or of action; who, not to impute a desire of being praised for his benevolence, is injured in no man's estimation; in whom also familiarity with large sums has produced that freedom in the expenditure of money which it never fails to operate, except in minds under the influence of a strong principle of avarice.

Our conclusion, perhaps, would be less favourable, but not less fair, if we were to try the characters in question by those surer tests, which are stated by the apostle to be less ambiguous marks of a real spirit of philanthropy. The strength of every passion is to be estimated by its victory over passions of an opposite nature. What judgment then shall we form of the force of the benevolence of the age, when measured by this standard? How does it stand the shock, when it comes into encounter with our pride, our vanity, our self-love, our self-interest, our love of ease or of pleasure, our ambition, our desire of worldly estimation? Does it make us self-denying, that we may be liberal in relieving others? Does it make us persevere in doing good in spite of ingratitude: and only pity the ignorance or prejudice or malice which misrepresents our conduct, or misconstrues our motives? Does it make us forbear what we conceive may prove the occasion of harm to a fellow-creature, though the harm should not seem naturally, or even fairly, to flow from our conduct, but to be the result only of his own obstinacy or weakness? Are we slow to believe any thing to our neighbour's disadvantage? and, when we cannot but credit it, are we disposed rather to cover, and, as far as we justly can, to palliate, than to divulge or aggravate it? Suppose an opportunity to occur of performing a kindness to one who, from pride or vanity, should be loath to receive, or to be known to receive, a favour from us; should we honestly endeavour, so far as we could with truth, to lessen in his own mind, and in that of others, the merit of our good offices, and, by so doing, dispose him to receive them with diminished reluctance and a less painful weight of obligation? This end, however, must be accomplished, if accomplished at all, not by speeches of affected disparagement, which we might easily foresee would produce the contrary effect; but by a simple and fair explanation of the circumstances which render the action in nowise inconvenient to ourselves, though highly beneficial to him. Can we, from motives of kindness, incur or risk the charge of being deficient in spirit, in penetration, or in foresight? Do we tell another of his faults, when the communication, though probably beneficial to him, cannot be made without embarrassment or pain to ourselves, and may probably lessen his regard for our person, or his opinion of our judgment? Can we stifle a repartee which would wound another, though the utterance of it would gratify our vanity, and the suppression of it may disparage our character for wit? If any one advance a mistaken proposition, in an instance wherein the error may be mischievous to him, can we, to the prejudice perhaps of our credit for discernment, forbear to contradict him in public, lest, by piquing his pride, we should only harden him in his error? and can we reserve our counsel for some more favourable season, the "mollia tempora fandi," when it may be communicated without offence? If we have recommended to any one a particular line of conduct, or have pointed out the probable mischiefs of the opposite course, and if our admonitions have been neglected, are we really hurt when our predictions of evil are accomplished? Is our love superior to envy and jealousy and emulation? Are we acute to discern, and forward to embrace, any fair opportunity of promoting the interests of another, if it be in a line wherein we ourselves also are moving, and in which we think our progress has not been proportionate to our desert? Can we take pleasure in bringing his merits into notice, and in obviating the prejudices which may have damped his efforts, or in removing the obstacles which may have retarded his advancement? If even to this extent we should be able to stand the scrutiny, let it be further asked, how, in the case of our enemies, do we correspond with the Scripture representations of love? Are we meek under provocations, ready to forgive, and apt to forget injuries? Can we, with sincerity, “bless them that curse us, do good to them that hate us, and pray for them who despitefully use us, and persecute us?” Do we prove to the Searcher of hearts a real spirit of forgiveness, by our forbearing, not only from avenging an injury when it is in our power, but even from telling to any one how ill we have been used; and that, too, when we are not kept silent by a consciousness that we should lose credit by divulging the circumstance? And, lastly, can we not only be content to return our enemies good for evil, (for this return, as has been remarked by one of the greatest of uninspired authorities,* may be prompted by pride, and repaid by self-complacency,) but, when they are successful or unsuccessful without our having contributed to their good or ill fortune, can we not only be content, but cordially rejoice in their prosperity, or sympathise with their distresses?

These are but a few specimens of the characteristic marks which might be stated of a true predominant benevolence; yet even these may serve to convince us how far the bulk of nominal Christians fall short of the requisitions of Scripture, even in that particular which exhibits their character in the most favourable point of view. The truth is, we do not enough call to mind the exalted tone of Scripture morality; and are therefore apt to value ourselves on the heights to which we attain, when a better acquaintance with our standard would have convinced us of our falling far short of the elevation prescribed to us. It is in the very instance of the most difficult of the duties lately specified, the forgiveness and love of enemies, that our Saviour points out to our imitation the example of our Supreme Benefactor. After stating that, by being kind and courteous to those who, even in the world's opinion, had a title to our good offices and good will, we should in vain set up a claim to Christian benevolence, he emphatically adds, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father who is in heaven is perfect."

* Lord Bacon.

We must here again resort to a topic which was lately touched on, that of theatrical amusements; and recommend it to their advocates to consider them in connection with the duty, of which we have now been exhibiting some of the leading characters.

It is an undeniable fact, for the truth of which we may safely appeal to every age and nation, that the situation of the performers, particularly of those of the female sex, is remarkably unfavourable to the maintenance and growth of the religious and moral principle, and of course highly dangerous to their eternal interests. Might it not then be fairly asked, how far, in all who confess the truth of this position, it is consistent with the sensibility of Christian benevolence, merely for the entertainment of an idle hour, to encourage the continuance of any of their fellow-creatures in such a way of life, and to take a part in tempting any others to enter into it? how far, considering that, by their own concession, they are employing whatever they spend in this way in sustaining and advancing the cause of vice, and consequently in promoting misery, they are herein bestowing this share of their wealth in a manner agreeable to the intentions of their holy and benevolent Benefactor? how far also they are not in this instance the rather criminal, from there being so many sources of innocent pleasure open to their enjoyment? how far they are acting conformably to that golden principle of doing to others as we would they should do to us? how far they harmonize with the spirit of the apostle's affectionate declaration, that he would deny himself for his whole life the most innocent indulgence, nay, what might seem almost an absolute necessary, rather than cause his weak fellow-Christian to offend? or, lastly, how far they are influenced by the solemn language of our Saviour himself: "It must needs be that offences come, but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh; it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were cast into the depths of the sea?"—The present instance is perhaps another example of our taking greater concern in the temporal than in the spiritual interests of our fellow-creatures. That man would be deemed, and justly deemed, of an inhuman temper, who in these days were to seek his amusement in the combats of gladiators and prize-fighters; yet Christians appear conscious of no inconsistency, in finding their pleasure in spectacles maintained at the risk at least, if not the ruin, of the eternal happiness of those who perform in them !

SECT. VI.

Grand Defect—Neglect of the peculiar Doctrines of Christianity.

But the grand radical defect in the practical system of these nominal Christians, is their forgetfulness of all the peculiar doctrines of the religion which they profess—the corruption of human nature—the atonement of the Saviour—and the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit.

Here, then, we come again to the grand distinction between the religion of Christ and that of the bulk of nominal Christians in the present day. The point is of the utmost practical importance, and we would therefore trace it into its actual effects.

There are, it is to be apprehended, not a few, who, having been for some time hurried down the stream of dissipation, in the indulgence of all their natural appetites, (except, perhaps, that they were restrained from very gross vice by a regard to character, or by the yet unsubdued voice of conscience,)—and who, having all the while thought little, or scarcely at all, about religion, (“living,” to use the emphatical language of Scripture, “without God in the world,”)—become at length in some degree impressed with a sense of the infinite importance of religion. A fit of sickness, perhaps, or the loss of some friend or much-loved relative, or some other stroke of adverse fortune, damps their spirits, awakens them to a practical conviction of the precariousness of all human things, and turns them to seek for some more stable foundation of happiness than this world can afford. Looking into themselves ever so little, they become sensible that they must have offended God. They resolve accordingly to set about the work of reformation.—Here it is that we shall recognise the fatal effects of the prevailing ignorance of the real nature of Christianity, and the general forgetfulness of its grand peculiarities. These men wish to reform, but they know neither the real nature of their disease, nor its true remedy. They are aware, indeed, that they must “cease to do evil, and learn to do well;” that they must relinquish their habits of vice, and attend more or less to the duties of religion; but, having no conception of the actual malignity of the disease under which they labour, or of the perfect cure which the gospel has provided for it, or of the manner in which that cure is to be effected,—

“They do but skin and film the ulcerous place, While rank corruption, mining all within,
Infects unseen.”

It often happens, therefore, but too naturally in this case, that where they do not soon desist from their attempt at reformation, and relapse into their old habits of sin, they take up with a partial and scanty amendment, and fondly flatter themselves that it is a thorough change. They now conceive that they have a right to take to themselves the comforts of Christianity. Not being able to raise their practice up to their standard of right, they lower their standard to their practice: they sit down for life, contented with their present attainments, beguiled by the complacencies of their own minds, and by the favourable testimony of surrounding friends; and it often happens, particularly where there is any degree of strictness in formal and ceremonial observances, that there are no people more jealous of their character for religion.

Others perhaps go farther than this. The dread of the wrath to come has sunk deeper into their hearts; and for a while they strive with all their might to resist their evil propensities, and to walk without stumbling in the path of duty. Again and again they resolve: again and again they break their resolutions.* All their endeavours are foiled, and they become more and more convinced of their own moral weakness, and of the strength of their inherent corruption. Thus groaning under the enslaving power of sin, and experiencing the futility of the utmost efforts which they can use for effecting their deliverance, they are tempted (sometimes it is to be feared they yield to the temptation) to give up all in despair, and to acquiesce in their wretched captivity, conceiving it impossible to break their chains. Sometimes, probably, it even happens that they are driven to seek for refuge from their disquietude in the suggestions of infidelity; and to quiet their troublesome consciences by arguments which they themselves scarcely believe, at the very moment in which they suffer themselves to be lulled asleep by them. In the meantime, while this conflict has been going on, their walk is sad and comfortless, and their couch is nightly watered with tears. These men are pursuing the right object, but they mistake the way in which it is to be obtained. The path in which they are now treading is not that which the gospel has provided for conducting them to true holiness, nor will they find in it any solid peace.

* If any one would read a description of this process, enlivened and enforced by the powers of the most exquisite poetry, let him peruse the middle and latter part of the fifth Book of Cowper's Task. My warm attachment to the beautifully natural compositions of this truly Christian poet, may perhaps bias my judgment; but the part of the work to which I refer appears to me scarcely surpassed by any thing in our language. The honourable epithet of Christian may justly be assigned to a poet, whose writings, while they fascinate the reader by their manifestly coming from the heart, breathe throughout the spirit of that character of Christianity with which she was announced to the world: "Glorify to God, peace on earth, goodwill towards men."

Persons under these circumstances naturally seek for religious instruction. They turn over the works of our modern religionists, and, as well as they can, collect the advice addressed to men in their situation; the substance of which is, at best, of this sort; "Be sorry indeed for your sins, and discontinue the practice of them; but do not make yourselves so uneasy. Christ died for the sins of the whole world. Do your utmost; discharge with fidelity the duties of your stations, not neglecting your religious offices; and fear not but that, in the end, all will go well; and that, having thus performed the conditions required on your part, you will at last obtain forgiveness of your merciful Creator, through the merits of Jesus Christ, and be aided, where your own strength shall be insufficient, by the assistance of his Holy Spirit. Meanwhile you cannot do better than read carefully such books of practical divinity as will instruct you in the principles of a Christian life. We are excellently furnished with works of this nature; and it is by the diligent study of them that you will gradually become a proficient in the lessons of the gospel."

But the Holy Scriptures, and with them the Church of England, call upon those who are in the circumstances above stated, to lay afresh the whole foundation of their religion. In concurrence with the Scripture, that Church calls upon them, in the first place, gratefully to adore that undeserved goodness which has awakened them from the sleep of death; to prostrate themselves before the cross of Christ with humble penitence and deep self-abhorrence; solemnly resolving to forsake all their sins, but relying on the grace of God alone for power to keep their resolution. Thus, and thus only, she assures them that all their crimes will be blotted out, and that they will receive from above a new living principle of holiness. She produces from the word of God the ground and warrant of her counsel:—"Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."—"No man," says our blessed Saviour, "cometh unto the Father but by me."—"I am the true vine. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me."—"He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without" (or severed from) "me ye can do nothing."—"By grace ye are saved through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works."

Let me not be thought tedious, or be accused of running into needless repetitions, in pressing this point with so much earnestness. It is in fact a point which can never be too much insisted on. It is the cardinal point on which the whole of Christianity turns; on which it is peculiarly proper in this place to be perfectly distinct. There have been some who have imagined, that the wrath of God was to be deprecated, or his favour conciliated, by austerities and penances, or even by forms and ceremonies, and external observances. But all men of enlightened understandings, who acknowledge the moral government of God, must also acknowledge, that vice must offend, and virtue delight him. In short, they must, more or less, assent to the Scripture declaration—"Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." But the grand distinction which subsists between the true Christian and all other religionists, (the class of persons in particular whom it is my object to address,) is concerning the nature of this holiness, and the way in which it is to be obtained. The views entertained by the latter of the nature of holiness, are of all degrees of inadequateness; and they conceive it is to be obtained by their own natural unassisted efforts: or if they admit some vague indistinct notion of the assistance of the Holy Spirit, it is unquestionably obvious, on conversing with them, that this does not constitute the main practical ground of their dependence. But the nature of that holiness which the true Christian seeks to possess, is no other than the restoration of the image of God to his soul: and, as to the manner of acquiring it, disclaiming with indignation every idea of attaining it by his own strength, he rests altogether on the operation of God's Holy Spirit, which is promised to all who cordially embrace the gospel. He knows, therefore, that this holiness is not to precede his reconciliation with God, and be its cause; but to follow it, and be its effect. That, in short, it is by faith in Christ only* that he is to be justified in the sight of God; to be delivered from the condition of a child of wrath and a slave of Satan; to be adopted into the family of God; to become an heir of God, and a joint-heir with Christ, entitled to all the privileges which belong to this high relation: here, to the Spirit of Grace, and a partial renewal after the image of his Creator; hereafter, to the more perfect possession of the divine likeness, and an inheritance of eternal glory.

And as it is in this way that, in obedience to the dictates of the gospel, the true Christian must originally become possessed of the vital spirit and living principle of universal holiness; so, in order to grow in grace, he must also study in the same school; finding, in the consideration of the peculiar doctrines of the gospel, and in the contemplation of the life and character and sufferings of our blessed Saviour, the elements of all practical wisdom, and an inexhaustible storehouse of instructions and motives, no otherwise to be so well supplied. From the neglect of these peculiar doctrines arise the main practical errors of the bulk of professed Christians. These gigantic truths retained in view, would put to shame the littleness of their dwarfish morality. It would be impossible for them to make these harmonize with their inadequate conceptions of the wretchedness and danger of our natural state, which is represented in Scripture as having so powerfully called forth the compassion of God, that he sent his only-begotten Son to rescue us. Where now are their low views of the worth of the soul, when means like these were taken to redeem it? Where now their inadequate conceptions of the guilt of sin, for which, in the divine counsels, it seemed requisite that an atonement no less costly should be made than that of the blood of the only-begotten Son of God? How can they reconcile their low standard of Christian practice, with the representation of our being "temples of the Holy Ghost;" their cold sense of obligation, and scanty grudging returns of service, with the glowing gratitude of those, who, having been "delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son," may well conceive, that the labours of a whole life will be but an imperfect expression of their thankfulness?

* Here again let it be remarked, that faith, where genuine, is always accompanied with repentance, abhorrence of sin, &c.

The peculiar doctrines of the gospel being once admitted, the conclusions which have been now suggested are clear and obvious deductions of reason. But our neglect of these important truths is still less pardonable, because they are distinctly and repeatedly applied in Scripture to the very purposes in question; and the whole superstructure of Christian morals is grounded on their deep and ample basis. Sometimes these truths are represented in Scripture generally, as furnishing Christians with a vigorous and ever-present principle of universal obedience; and almost every particular Christian duty is occasionally traced to them as to its proper source. They are everywhere represented as warming the hearts of the people of God on earth with continual admiration and thankfulness and love and joy ; as enabling them to triumph over the attack of the last great enemy, and as calling forth afresh in heaven the ardent effusions of their unexhausted gratitude.

If, then, we would indeed be “filled with wisdom and spiritual understanding,”—if we would “walk worthy of the Lord unto all well pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God,”—here let us fix our eyes ! “Laying aside every weight, and the sin that does so easily beset us, let us run with patience the race that is set before us, LOOKING UNTO JESUS, the Author and Finisher of our faith, who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God.”

Here best we may learn the infinite importance of Christianity ; how little it deserves to be treated in that slight and superficial way in which it is in these days regarded by the bulk of nominal Christians, who are apt to think it enough, and almost equally pleasing to God, to be religious in any way, and upon any system. What exquisite folly must it be to risk the soul on such a presumption, in direct opposition to the dictates of reason, and the express declaration of the word of God ! “How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation ?”

LOOKING UNTO JESUS !—Here we shall best learn the duty and reasonableness of an absolute and unconditional surrender of soul and body to the will and service of God!—"We are not our own;" for "we are bought with a price," and must therefore make it our grand concern to "glorify God with our bodies and our spirits, which are God's." Should we be base enough, even if we could do it with safety, to make any reserves in our returns of service to that gracious Saviour, who "gave up himself for us?" If we have formerly talked of compounding by the performance of some commands for the breach of others, can we now bear the mention of a composition of duties, or of retaining to ourselves the right of practising little sins? The very suggestion of such an idea fills us with indignation and shame, if our hearts be not dead to every sense of gratitude.

LOOKING UNTO JESUS!—Here we find displayed, in the most lively colours, the guilt of sin; and how hateful it must be to the perfect holiness of that Being who is of "purer eyes than to behold iniquity." When we see that rather than sin should go unpunished, "God spared not his own Son," but "was pleased to bruise him and put him to grief" for our sakes—how vainly must impenitent sinners flatter themselves with the hope of escaping the vengeance of Heaven, and buoy themselves up with I know not what desperate dreams of the Divine benignity!

Here too we may anticipate the dreadful sufferings of that state where shall be "weeping and gnashing of teeth;" when, rather than that we should undergo them, "the Son of God" himself, who "thought it no robbery to be equal with God," consented to take upon him our degraded nature, with all its weaknesses and infirmities; to be "a man of sorrows;"

to "hide not his face from shame and spitting;" to be "wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities," and at length to endure the sharpness of death, "even the death of the cross;" that he might deliver us from the "wrath to come," and open the kingdom of heaven to all believers.

LOOKING UNTO JESUS!—Here best ye may learn to grow in the love of God. The certainty of his pity and love towards repenting sinners, thus irrefragably demonstrated, chases away the sense of tormenting fear, and best lays the ground in us of reciprocal affection. And while we steadily contemplate this wonderful transaction, and consider in its several relations the amazing truth that "God spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all,"—if our minds be not utterly dead to every impulse of sensibility, the emotions of admiration, of preference, of hope and trust and joy, cannot but spring up within us, chastened with reverential fear, and softened and quickened by overflowing gratitude.* Here we shall become animated by an abiding disposition to endeavour to please our great Benefactor; and by a humble persuasion that the weakest endeavours of this nature will not be despised by a Being who has already proved himself so kindly affected towards us.† Here we cannot fail to imbibe an earnest desire of possessing his favour, and a conviction, founded on his own declarations thus unquestionably confirmed, that the desire shall not be disappointed. Whenever we are conscious that we have offended this gracious Being, a single thought of the great work of redemption will be enough to fill us with compunction. We shall feel a deep concern, grief mingled with indignant shame, for having conducted ourselves so unworthily towards One who to us has been infinite in kindness: we shall not rest till we have reason to hope that he is reconciled to us; and we shall watch over our hearts and conduct in future with a renewed jealousy, lest we should again offend him. To those who are ever so little acquainted with the nature of the human mind, it were superfluous to remark, that the affections and tempers which have been enumerated are the infallible marks of the constituent properties of love. Let him then who would abound and grow in this Christian principle be much conversant with the great doctrines of the gospel.

* See Chap. III, where these were shown to be the elementary principles of the passion of love.

† Romans v, 9, 10.

It is obvious that the attentive and frequent consideration of these great doctrines must have a still more direct tendency to produce and cherish in our minds the principle of the love of Christ. But on this head so much was said in a former chapter that any further observations upon it are unnecessary.

Much also has been already observed concerning the love of our fellow-creatures; and it has been distinctly stated to be the indispensable and indeed the characteristic duty of Christians. It remains, however, to be here further remarked, that this grace can nowhere be cultivated with more advantage than at the foot of the cross. Nowhere can our Saviour's dying injunction to the exercise of this virtue be recollected with more effect, "This is my commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you."

Nowhere can the admonition of the apostle more powerfully affect us, "Be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven you." The view of mankind which is here presented to us, as being all involved in one common ruin, and the offer of deliverance held out to all, through the atoning sacrifice of the Son of God, are well calculated to produce that sympathy towards our fellow-creatures which, by the constitution of our nature, seldom fails to result from the consciousness of an identity of interests and a similarity of fortunes. Pity for an unthinking world assists this impression. Our enmities soften and melt away; we are ashamed of thinking much of the petty injuries which we may have suffered, when we consider what the Son of God, "who did no wrong, neither was guile found in his mouth," patiently endured. Our hearts become tender while we contemplate this signal act of loving kindness. We grow desirous of imitating what we cannot but admire. A vigorous principle of enlarged and active charity springs up within us; and we go forth with alacrity, desirous of treading in the steps of our blessed Master, and of manifesting our gratitude for his unmerited goodness, by bearing each other's burden, and abounding in the disinterested labours of benevolence.

LOOKING UNTO JESUS!—He was meek and lowly of heart, and from the study of his character we shall best learn the lessons of humility. Contemplating the work of redemption, we become more and more impressed with the sense of our natural darkness and helplessness and misery, from which it was requisite to ransom us at such a price; more and more conscious that we are utterly unworthy of all the amazing condescension and love which have been manifested towards us; ashamed of the callousness of our tenderest sensibility, and of the poor returns of our most active services. Considerations like these, abating our pride, and reducing our opinions of ourselves, naturally moderate our pretensions towards others. We become less disposed to exact that respect for our persons, and that deference for our authority, which we naturally covet; we less sensibly feel a slight, and less hotly resent it; we grow less irritable, less prone to be dissatisfied; more soft and meek and courteous and placable and condescending. We are not literally required to practise the same humiliating submissions to which our blessed Saviour himself was not ashamed to stoop;* but the spirit of the remark applies to us, "the servant is not greater than his lord;" and we should especially bear this truth in mind when the occasion calls upon us to discharge some duty, or patiently to suffer some ill treatment, whereby our pride will be wounded, and we are likely to be in some degree degraded from the rank we had possessed in the world's estimation. At the same time the sacred Scriptures assuring us, that the powerful operations of the Holy Spirit, purchased for us by the death of Christ, we must be indebted for the success of all our endeavours after improvement in virtue: the conviction of this truth tends to render us diffident of our own powers, and to suppress the first risings of vanity. Thus, while we are conducted to heights of virtue, no otherwise attainable, due care is taken to prevent our becoming giddy from our elevation.* It is the Scripture characteristic of the gospel system, that by it all disposition to exalt ourselves is excluded; and if we really grow in grace, we shall grow also in humility.

* John xiii, 13—17. "If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet," &c.

LOOKING UNTO JESUS!—"He endured the cross, despising the shame."—While we steadily contemplate this solemn scene, that sober frame of spirit is produced within us which best befits the Christian militant here on earth. We become impressed with a sense of the shortness and uncertainty of time, and with the necessity of being diligent in making provision for eternity. In such a temper of mind, the pomps and vanities of life are cast behind us as the baubles of children. We lose our relish for the frolics of gayety, the race of ambition, or the grosser gratifications of voluptuousness. In the case even of those objects which may more justly claim the attention of reasonable and immortal beings—in our family arrangements, in our plans of life, in our schemes of business—we become, without relinquishing the path of duty, more moderate in pursuit, and more indifferent about the issue. Here also we learn to correct the world's false estimate of things, and to "look through the shallowness of earthly grandeur;" to venerate what is truly excellent and noble, though under a despised and degraded form; and to cultivate within ourselves that true magnanimity, which can make us rise superior to the smiles or frowns of this world; that dignified composure of soul, which no earthly incidents can destroy or ruffle. Instead of repining at any of the little occasional inconveniences we may meet with in our passage through life, we are almost ashamed of the multiplied comforts and enjoyments of our condition, when we think of him who, though “the Lord of glory,” “had not where to lay his head.” And if it be our lot to undergo evils of more than ordinary magnitude, we are animated under them by reflecting, that we are hereby more conformed to the example of our blessed Master; though we must ever recollect one important difference, that the sufferings of Christ were voluntarily borne for our benefit, and were probably far more exquisitely agonizing than any which we are called upon to undergo. Besides, it must be a solid support to us amidst all our troubles, to know that they do not happen to us by chance; that they are not merely the punishment of sin; but that they are the dispensations of a kind Providence, and sent on messages of mercy.—“The cup that our Father hath given us, shall we not drink it?”—“Blessed Saviour! by the bitterness of thy pains we may estimate the force of thy love; we are sure of thy kindness and compassion; thou wouldst not willingly call on us to suffer; thou hast declared unto us that all things shall finally work together for good to them that love thee; and therefore, if thou so ordainest it, welcome disappointment and poverty; welcome sickness and pain; welcome even shame and contempt and calumny. If this be a rough and thorny path, it is one in which thou hast gone before us. Where we see thy footsteps we cannot repine. Meanwhile, thou wilt support us with the consolations of thy grace; and even here thou canst more than compensate any temporal sufferings, by the possession of that peace which the world can neither give nor take away."

* See Pascal's Thoughts on Religion—a book tabour ding the deepest views of practical Christianity.

LOOKING UNTO JESUS!—"The Author and Finisher of our faith, who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of God." From the scene of our Saviour's weakness and degradation, we follow him in idea, into the realms of glory, where "he is on the right hand of God; angels and principalities and powers being made subject unto him."—But, though changed in place, yet not in nature; he is still full of sympathy and love; and, having died "to save his people from their sins," "he ever liveth to make intercession for them." Cheered by this animating view, the Christian's fainting spirits revive. Under the heaviest burdens, he feels his strength recruited; and when all around him is dark and stormy, he can lift up an eye to heaven, radiant with hope and glistening with gratitude. At such a season, no dangers can alarm, no opposition can move, no provocations can irritate. He may almost adopt, as the language of his sober exultation, what in the philosopher was but an idle rant; and, considering that it is only the garment of mortality which is subject to the rents of fortune, his spirit, cheered with divine support, keeps its place within, secure and unassailable; so that he can almost triumph at the stake or on the scaffold, and cry out, amidst the severest buffets of adversity, "Thou beatest but the case of Anaxarchus." But it is rarely that the Christian is elevated with this "joy unspeakable and full of glory:" he even lends himself to these views with moderation and reserve. Often, alas! emotions of another kind fill him with grief and confusion. Conscious, perhaps, of having acted unworthy of his high calling, and of having exposed himself to the just censure of a world ready enough to spy out his infirmities, he seems to himself almost "to have crucified the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame." But let neither his joys intoxicate, nor his sorrows too much depress him. Let him still remember, that his chief business while on earth is not to meditate, but to act; that the seeds of moral corruption are apt to spring up within him; and that it is requisite for him to watch over his own heart with incessant care. That he is to discharge with fidelity the duties of his particular station, and to conduct himself, according to his measure, after the example of his blessed Master, whose meat and drink it was to do the work of his heavenly Father. That he is diligently to cultivate the talents with which God has entrusted him, and assiduously to employ them in doing justice and showing mercy, while he guards against the assaults of any internal enemy. In short, he is to demean himself, in all the common affairs of life, like an accountable creature, who, in correspondence with the Scripture character of Christians, is "waiting for the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ." Often therefore he questions himself, "Am I employing my time, my fortune, my bodily and mental powers, so as to be able to 'render up my account with joy and not with grief? Am I 'adorning the doctrine of God my Saviour in all things;' and proving that the servants of Christ, animated by a principle of filial affection, which renders their work a service of perfect freedom, are capable of as active and as persevering exertions as the votaries of fame, or the slaves of ambition, or the drudges of avarice?"

Thus, without interruption to his labours, he may interpose occasional thoughts of things unseen; and, amidst the many little intervals of business, may calmly look upwards to the heavenly Advocate, who is ever pleading the cause of his people, and obtaining for them needful supplies of grace and consolation. It is these realizing views which give the Christian a relish for the worship and service of the heavenly world. And if these blessed images, "seen but through a glass darkly," can thus refresh the soul, what must be its state, when, on the morning of the resurrection, it shall awake to the unclouded vision of celestial glory! when, "to them that look for him, the Son of God shall appear a second time without sin unto salvation!" when, "sighing and sorrow being fled away,"—when, doubts and fears no more disquieting, and the painful consciousness of remaining imperfections no longer weighing down the spirit, they shall enter upon the fruition of "those joys which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither has it entered into the heart of man to conceive;" and shall bear their part in that blessed anthem, "Salvation to our God who sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb," for ever and ever!

Thus, never let it be forgotten, the main distinction between real Christianity, and the system of the bulk of nominal Christians, chiefly consists in the different place which is assigned in the two schemes to the peculiar doctrines of the gospel. These, in the scheme of nominal Christians, if admitted at all, appear but like the stars of the firmament to the ordinary eye. Those splendid luminaries draw forth, perhaps, occasionally a transient expression of admiration, when we behold their beauty, or hear of their distances, magnitudes, or properties; now and then too we are led, perhaps, to muse upon their possible uses; but, however curious as subjects of speculation, it must, after all, be confessed, they twinkle to the common observer with a vain and "idle" lustre; and, except in the dreams of the astrologer, have no influence on human happiness, or any concern with the course and order of the world. But to the real Christian, on the contrary, these peculiar doctrines constitute the centre to which he gravitates! the very sun of his system! the origin of all that is excellent and lovely! the source of light and life and motion and genial warmth and plastic energy! Dim is the light of reason, and cold and comfortless our state while left to her unassisted guidance. Even the Old Testament itself, though a revelation from Heaven, shines but with feeble and scanty rays. But the blessed truths of the gospel are now unveiled to our eyes, and we are called upon to behold and to enjoy "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ," in the full radiance of its meridian splendour. The words of inspiration best express our highly-favoured state: "We all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord."

"Thou art the source and centre of all minds,

Their only point of rest, ETERNAL WORD ;
 From thee departing, they are lost, and rove
 At random, without honour, hope, or peace :
 From thee is all that soothes the life of man ;
 His high endeavour, and his glad success ;
 His strength to suffer, and his will to serve.
 But O ! THOU BOUNTEOUS GIVER of all good !
 Thou art of all thy gifts thyself the crown :
 Give what thou canst, without thee we are poor,
 And with thee rich, take what thou wilt away."

COWPER.

CHAPTER V.

ON THE EXCELLENCE OF CHRISTIANITY IN CERTAIN IMPORTANT PARTICULARS. ARGUMENT WHICH RESULTS THENCE IN PROOF OF ITS DIVINE ORIGIN.

THE writer of the present work, having now completed a faint delineation of the leading features of real Christianity, may be permitted to suspend for a few moments the further execution of his plan, for the purpose of pointing out some excellencies which she really possesses ; but which, as they are not to be found in that superficial system which so unworthily usurps her name, appear scarcely to have attracted sufficient notice. If he should seem to be deviating from the plan which he proposed to himself, he would suggest, as his excuse, that the observations which he is about to offer will furnish a strong argument in favour of the correctness of his preceding representation of the nature and characters of that religion which alone deserves to be called Christianity.

It holds true, indeed, in the case of Christianity, as in that of all the works of God, that though a superficial and cursory view cannot fail to discover to us somewhat of their beauty; yet when on a more careful and accurate scrutiny we become better acquainted with their properties, we become also more deeply impressed by a conviction of their excellence. We may begin by referring to the last chapter for an instance of the truth of this assertion. Therein was pointed out that intimate connection—that perfect harmony, between the leading doctrines and the practical precepts of Christianity which is apt to escape the attention of the ordinary eye.

It may not be improper also to remark, though the position be so obvious as almost to render the statement of it needless, that there is the same close connection in the leading doctrines of Christianity with each other, and the same perfect harmony between them. It is self-evident, that the corruption of human nature, that our reconciliation to God by the atonement of Christ, and that the restoration of our primitive dignity by the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit, are all parts of one whole, united in close dependence and mutual congruity.

Perhaps, however, it has not been sufficiently noticed, that, in the chief practical precepts of Christianity, there is the same essential agreement, the same mutual dependency of one upon another. Let us survey this fresh instance of the wisdom of that system which is the only solid foundation of our present or future happiness.

The virtues most strongly and repeatedly enjoined in Scripture, and by our progress in which we may best measure our advancement in holiness, and the fear and love of God and of Christ; love, kindness, and meekness, towards our fellow-creatures; indifference to the possessions and events of this life, in comparison with our concern about eternal things; self-denial, and humility.

It has been already pointed out in many particulars, how essentially such of these Christian graces as respect the divine Being are connected with those which have more directly for their objects our fellow-creatures and ourselves. But in the case of these two last descriptions of Christian graces, the more attentively we consider them with reference to the acknowledged principles of human nature, and to indisputable facts, the more we shall be convinced that they afford mutual aid towards the acquisition of each other; and that, when acquired, they all harmonize with each other in perfect and essential union. This truth may perhaps be sufficiently apparent from what has been already remarked; but it may not be useless to dwell on it a little more in detail. Take, then, the instances of loving-kindness and meekness towards others; and observe the solid foundation which is laid for them in self-denial, in moderation as to the good things of this life, and in humility. The chief causes of enmity among men are pride and self-importance, the high opinion which men entertain of themselves, and the consequent deference which they exact from others; the overvaluation of worldly possessions and of worldly honours, and, in consequence, a too eager competition for them. The rough edges of one man rub against those of another, (if the expression may be allowed;) and the friction is often such as to injure the works, and disturb the just arrangements and regular motions of the social machine. But by Christianity all these roughnesses are filed down; every wheel rolls round smoothly in the performance of its appointed function, and there is nothing to retard the several movements, or break in upon the general order. The religious system, indeed, of the bulk of nominal Christians, is satisfied with some tolerable appearances of virtue; and, accordingly, while it recommends love and beneficence, it tolerates pride and vanity in many cases; it even countenances and commends the excessive valuation of character; and at least allows a man's whole soul to be absorbed in the pursuit of the object which he is following, be it what it may of personal or professional success. But though these latter qualities may, for the most part, fairly enough consist with a soft exterior and courtly demeanour, they cannot so well accord with the genuine internal principle of love. Some cause of discontent, some ground of jealousy or of envy, will arise, some suspicion will corrode, some disappointment will sour, some slight or calumny will irritate and provoke reprisals. In the higher walks of life, indeed, we learn to disguise our emotions; but such will be the real inward feelings of the soul, and they will frequently betray themselves when we are off our guard, or when we are not likely to be disparaged by the discovery. This state of the higher orders, in which men are scuffling eagerly for the same objects, and wearing all the while such an appearance of sweetness and complacency, has often appeared to me to be not ill illustrated by the image of a gaming-table. There every man is intent only on his own profit; the good success of one is the ill success of another; and therefore the general state of mind of the parties engaged may be pretty well conjectured. All this, however, does not prevent, in well bred societies, an exterior of perfect gentleness and good humour. But let the same employment be carried on among the lower orders, who are not so well schooled in the art of disguising their feelings, or in places where, by general connivance, people are allowed to give vent to their real emotions, and every passion will display itself, by which the “human face divine” can be distorted and deformed. For those who never have been present at so humiliating a scene, the pencil of Hogarth has provided a representation of it which is scarcely exaggerated; and the horrid name * by which it is familiarly known among its frequenters sufficiently attests the fidelity of its resemblance.

But Christianity is not satisfied with producing merely the specious guise of virtue. She requires the substantial reality, which may stand the scrutinizing eye of that Being “who searches the heart.” Meaning therefore that the Christian should live and breathe in an atmosphere, as it were, of benevolence, she forbids whatever can tend to obstruct its diffusion, or vitiate its purity. It is on this principle that emulation is forbidden; for, besides that this passion almost insensibly degenerates into envy, and that it derives its origin chiefly from pride and a desire of self-exaltation—how can we easily love our neighbour as ourselves, if we consider him at the same time as our rival, and are intent upon surpassing him in the pursuit of whatever is the subject of our competition?

* The Hell,—so called, let it be observed, not by way of reproach, but familiarity, by those who frequent it.

Christianity, again, teaches us not to set our hearts on earthly possessions and earthly honours; and thereby provides for our really loving, or even cordially forgiving, those who have been more successful than ourselves in the attainment of them, or who have even designedly thwarted us in the pursuit. "Mind not high things," says the apostle. How can he who means to attempt, in any degree, to obey this precept, and the many other passages of Scripture which speak a similar language, be irreconcilably hostile towards any one who may have been instrumental in his depression?

Christianity also teaches us not to prize human estimation at a very high rate; and thereby provides for the practice of her injunction, to love from the heart those who, justly or unjustly, may have attacked our reputation, and wounded our character. She commands not the show but the reality of meekness and gentleness; and, by thus taking away the aliment of anger and the fomenters of discord, she provides for the maintenance of peace, and the restoration of good temper among men, when it may have sustained a temporary interruption.

It is another capital excellence of Christianity, that she values moral attainments at a far higher rate than intellectual acquisitions, and proposes to conduct her followers to the heights of virtue rather than of knowledge. On the contrary, most of the false religious systems which have prevailed in the world, have proposed to reward the labour of their votary, by drawing aside the veil which concealed from the vulgar eye their hidden mysteries, and by introducing him to the knowledge of their deeper and more sacred doctrines.

This is eminently the case in the Hindoo and in the Mahometan religion, in that of China, and, for the most part, in the various modifications of ancient Paganism. In systems which proceed on this principle, it is obvious that the bulk of mankind can never make any great proficiency. There was accordingly, among the nations of antiquity, one system, whatever it was, for the learned, and another for the illiterate. Many of the philosophers spoke out, and professed to keep the lower orders in ignorance for the general good; plainly suggesting, that the bulk of mankind was to be considered as almost of an inferior species. Aristotle himself countenanced this opinion. An opposite mode of proceeding naturally belongs to Christianity, which, without distinction, professes an equal regard for all human beings, and which was characterized by her first Promulgator as the messenger of "glad tidings to the poor."

But her preference of moral to intellectual excellence is not to be praised, only because it is congenial with her general character, and suitable to the ends which she professes to have in view. It is the part of true wisdom to endeavour to excel there, where we may really attain to excellence. This consideration might be alone sufficient to direct our efforts to the acquisition of virtue rather than of knowledge.—How limited is the range of the greatest human abilities! how scanty the stores of the richest human knowledge ! Those who undeniably have held the first rank both for natural and acquired endowments, instead of thinking their pre-eminence a just ground of self-exaltation, have commonly been the most forward to confess, that their views were bounded, and their attainments moderate. Had they indeed been less candid, this is a discovery which we could not have failed to make for ourselves. Experience daily furnishes us with examples of weakness and shortsightedness and error, in the wisest and the most learned of men, which might serve to confound the pride of human wisdom.

Not so in morals.—Made at first in the likeness of God, and still bearing about us some faint traces of our high original, we are offered by our blessed Redeemer the means of purifying ourselves from our corruptions, and of once more regaining the image of our heavenly Father.* In love, the compendious expression for almost every virtue, in fortitude under all its forms, in justice, in humility, and in all the other graces of the Christian character, we are made capable of attaining to heights of real elevation; and, were we but faithful in the use of the means of grace which we enjoy, the operations of the Holy Spirit, prompting and aiding our diligent endeavours, would infallibly crown our labours with success, and make us partakers of a divine nature. The writer has himself known some who have been instances of the truth of this remark. To the memory of one,† now no more, may he be permitted to offer the last tribute of respectful friendship. His course, short but laborious, has at length terminated in a better world; and his luminous track still shines in the sight, and animates the efforts of all who knew him, and “marshals them the way” to heavenly glory.—Let me not be thought to undervalue any of the gifts of God, or of the fruits of human exertion; but let not these be prized beyond their proper worth. If one of those little industrious reptiles, to which we have been well sent for a lesson of diligence and foresight, were to pride itself upon its strength, because it could carry off a larger grain of wheat than any other of its fellow ants, should we not laugh at the vanity which could be highly gratified with such a contemptible pre-eminence? And is it far different to the eye of reason, when man, weak, short-sighted man, is vain of surpassing others in knowledge, in which, at best, his progress must be so limited; forgetting the true dignity of his nature, and the path which would conduct him to real excellence?

* Ephesians ii.

† The Rev. Matthew Babington, of Rothley, in Leicestershire, who died lately at Lisbon.

The unparalleled value of the precepts of Christianity ought not to be passed over altogether unnoticed in this place, though it be needless to dwell on it; since it has been often justly recognised and asserted, and has in some points been ably illustrated, and powerfully enforced, by the masterly pen of a late writer. It is by no means, however, the design of this little work to attempt to trace the various excellencies of Christianity; but it may not have been improper to point out a few particulars, which, in the course of investigation, have naturally fallen under our notice, and hitherto perhaps may scarcely have been enough regarded. Every such instance, it should always be remembered, is a fresh proof of Christianity being a revelation from God.

It is still less, however, the intention of the writer, to attempt to vindicate the divine origin of our holy religion. This task has often been executed by far abler advocates. In particular, every Christian, with whatever reserves his commendations must be qualified, should be forward to confess his obligations on this head to the author before alluded to; whose uncommon acuteness has enabled him, in a field already so much trodden, to discover arguments which had eluded the observation of all by whom he was preceded, and whose unequalled perspicuity puts his reader in complete possession of the fruits of his sagacity. Anxious, however, in my little measure, to contribute to the support of this great cause, may it be permitted me to state one argument which impresses my mind with particular force? This is, the great variety of the kinds of evidence which have been adduced in proof of Christianity, and the confirmation thereby afforded of its truth:—The proof from prophecy—from miracles—from the character of Christ—from that of his apostles—from the nature of the doctrines of Christianity—from the nature and excellence of her practical precepts—from the accordance we have lately pointed out between the doctrinal and practical system of Christianity, whether considered each in itself or in their mutual relation to each other—from other species of internal evidence, afforded in the more abundance in proportion as the sacred records have been scrutinized with greater care—from the accounts of contemporary or nearly contemporary writers—from the impossibility of accounting on any other supposition than that of the truth of Christianity, for its promulgation and early prevalence: these and other lines of argument have all been brought forward and ably urged by different writers, in proportion as they have struck the minds of different observers more or less forcibly. Now, granting that some obscure and illiterate men, residing in a distant province of the Roman empire, had plotted to impose a forgery upon the world—though some foundation for the imposture might, and indeed must have been attempted to be laid—it seems, to my understanding at least, morally impossible that so many different species of proofs, and all so strong, should have lent their concurrent aid, and have united their joint force, in the establishment of the falsehood. It may assist the reader in estimating the value of this argument, to consider, upon how different a footing, in this respect, every other religious system which was ever proposed to the world has stood; and, indeed, every other historical fact of which the truth has been at all contested.

CHAPTER VI.

BRIEF INQUIRY INTO THE PRESENT STATE OF CHRISTIANITY IN THIS COUNTRY, WITH SOME OF THE CAUSES WHICH HAVE LED TO ITS CRITICAL CIRCUMSTANCES. ITS IMPORTANCE TO US AS A POLITICAL COMMUNITY; AND PRACTICAL HINTS FOR WHICH THE FOREGOING CONSIDERATIONS GIVE OCCASION.

It may not be altogether improper to remind the reader, that hitherto our discussion has been merely concerning the prevailing religious opinions of professed Christians: but now, no longer confining ourselves to persons of this description, let us extend our inquiry, and briefly investigate the general state of Christianity in this country.

The tendency of religion, in general, to promote the temporal welfare of political communities, is a fact which depends on principles so obvious and even undeniable, and is so forcibly inculcated by the history of all ages, that there can be no necessity for entering into a formal proof of its truth. It has indeed been maintained, not merely by schoolmen and divines, but by the most celebrated philosophers and moralists and politicians of every age.

The peculiar excellence in this respect also of Christianity, considered independently of its truth or falsehood, has been recognised by writers, who, to say the least, were not disposed to exaggerate its merits. Either of the above propositions being admitted, the state of religion in a country at any given period, (not to mention its connexion with the eternal happiness of the inhabitants,) immediately becomes a question of great political importance; and, in particular, it must be material to ascertain, whether religion be in an advancing or a declining state; and, if the latter be the case, whether there be any practical means for preventing at least its further declension.

If the foregoing representations of the state of Christianity among the bulk of professed Christians be not very erroneous, they may well excite serious apprehensions in the mind of every reader, considered merely in a political view. And these apprehensions would be increased, if there should appear reason to believe, that, for some time past, religion has been on the decline amongst us, and that it continues to decline at the present moment.

When it is proposed, however, to enquire into the actual state of religion in any country, and, in particular, to compare that state with its condition at any former period, there is one preliminary observation to be made, if we would not subject ourselves to gross error. There exists, established by tacit consent in every country, what may be called a general standard or tone of morals, varying in the same community at different periods, and differing at the same period in the different ranks of society. Whoever falls below this standard, (and, not unfrequently, whoever also rises above it,) offending against this general rule, suffers proportionably in the general estimation. Thus a regard for character (which is commonly the governing principle among men) becomes, to a certain degree, though no further, an incitement to morality and virtue. It follows, of course, that where the practice does no more than come up to the required level, it will be no sufficient evidence of the existence, much less will it furnish a means of estimating the force, of a real internal principle of religion. Christians, Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics, persons of ten thousand different sorts of passions and opinions, being members at the same time of the same community, and all conscious that they will be examined by this same standard, will regulate their conduct accordingly, and, with no great difference, will all adjust themselves to the required measure.

It must also be remarked, that the causes which tend to raise or to depress this standard commonly produce their effects by slow and almost insensible degrees; and that it often continues for some time nearly the same, when the circumstances by which it was fixed have materially altered.

It is a truth which will hardly be contested, that Christianity, whenever it has at all prevailed, has raised the general standard of morals to a height before unknown. Some actions, which among the ancients were scarcely held to be blemishes in the most excellent characters, have been justly considered, by the laws of every Christian community, as meriting the severest punishments. In other instances, virtues formerly rare have become common; and, in particular, a merciful and courteous temper has softened the rugged manners, and humanized the brutal ferocity, prevalent among the most polished nations of the heathen world. But from what has been recently observed, it is manifest, that, so far as external appearances are concerned, these effects, when once produced by Christianity, are produced alike in those who deny and in those who admit her divine original; I had almost said, in those who reject and those who cordially embrace the doctrines of the gospel; and these effects might and probably would remain for a while without any great apparent alteration, however her spirit might languish, or even her authority decline. The form of the temple, as was once beautifully remarked, may continue, when the dii tutelares have left it. When, therefore, we are enquiring into the real state of Christianity at any period, if we would not be deceived in this important investigation, we must be so much the more careful not to take up with superficial appearances.

It may perhaps help us to ascertain the advancing or declining state of Christianity in Great Britain at the present moment, and still more, to discover some of the causes by which that state has been produced, to employ a little time in considering what might naturally be expected to be its actual situation ; and what advantages or disadvantages such a religion might be expected to derive from the circumstances in which it has been placed among us, and from those in which it still continues.

Experience warrants, and reason justifies and explains the assertion, that persecution generally tends to quicken the vigour and extend the prevalence of the opinions which she would eradicate. For the peace of mankind, it has grown at length almost into an axiom, that “ her devilish engine back recoils upon herself.” Christianity especially has always thriven under persecution. At such a season she has no lukewarm professors ; no adherents concerning whom it is doubtful to what party they belong. The Christian is then reminded at every turn, that his Master’s kingdom is not of this world. When all on earth wears a black and threatening aspect, he looks up to heaven for consolation ; he learns practically to consider himself as a pilgrim and stranger. He then cleaves to fundamentals, and examines well his foundation, as at the hour of death. When religion is in a state of external quiet and prosperity, the contrary of all this naturally takes place. The soldiers of the church militant then forget that they are in a state of warfare. Their ardour slackens, their zeal languishes. Like a colony long settled in a strange country,* they are gradually assimilated, in features and demeanour and language, to the native inhabitants, till at length almost every vestige of peculiarity dies away.

If, in general, persecution and prosperity be respectively productive of these opposite effects, this circumstance alone might teach us what expectations to form concerning the state of Christianity in this country, where she has long been embodied in an establishment which is intimately blended with our civil institutions, and is generally and justly believed to have a common interest with them all—which is liberally (though by no means too liberally) endowed; and (not more favoured in wealth and dignity) has been allowed “to exalt her mitred front in courts and parliaments;” an establishment, the offices in which are extremely numerous; and these, not like the priesthood of the Jews, filled up from a particular race, or, like that of the Hindoos, held by a separate caste in entailed succession; but supplied from every class, and branching, by its widely extended ramifications, into almost every individual family in the community; an establishment, of which the ministers are not, like the Roman Catholic clergy, debarred from forming matrimonial ties, but are allowed to unite themselves, and multiply their holdings to the general mass of the community, by the close bonds of family connection; nor like some of the severer of the religious orders, immured in colleges and monasteries, but, both by law and custom, permitted to mix without restraint in all the intercourses of society.

* The author must acknowledge himself indebted to Dr. Owen for this illustration.

Such being the circumstances of the pastors of the church, let the community in general be supposed to have been for some time in a rapidly improving state of commercial prosperity; let it also be supposed to have been making no unequal progress in all those arts and sciences, and literary productions, which have ever been the growth of a polished age, and are the sure marks of a highly finished condition of society. It is not difficult to anticipate the effects likely to be produced on vital religion, both in the clergy and the laity, by such a state of external prosperity as has been assigned to them respectively. And these effects would infallibly be furthered, where the country in question should enjoy a free constitution of government. We formerly had occasion to quote the remark of an accurate observer of the stage of human life, that a much looser system of morals commonly prevails among the higher than in the middling and lower orders of society. Now in every country of which the middling classes are daily growing in wealth and consequence by the success of their commercial speculations; and, most of all in a country having such a constitution as our own, where the acquisition of riches is the possession also of rank and power; with the comforts and refinement, the vices also of the higher orders are continually descending, and a mischievous uniformity of sentiments and manners and morals gradually diffuses itself throughout the whole community. The multiplication of great cities also, and, above all, the habit, ever increasing with the increasing wealth of the country, of frequenting a splendid and luxurious metropolis, would powerfully tend to accelerate the discontinuance of the religious habits of a purer age, and to accomplish the substitution of a more relaxed morality. And it must even be confessed, that the commercial spirit, much as we are indebted to it, is not naturally favourable to the maintenance of the religious principle in a vigorous and lively state.

In times like these, therefore, the strict precepts and self-denying habits of Christianity naturally slide into disuse, and even among the better sort of Christians, are likely to be so far softened, as to become less averse to the generally prevailing disposition towards relaxation and indulgence. In such prosperous circumstances, men, in truth, are apt to think very little about religion. Christianity, therefore, seldom occupying the attention of the bulk of nominal Christians, and being scarcely at all the object of their study, we should expect, of course, to find them extremely unacquainted with its tenets. Those doctrines and principles indeed, which it contains in common with the law of the land, or which are sanctioned by the general standard of morals formerly described, being brought into continual notice and mention by the common occurrences of life, might continue to be recognised. But whatever she contains peculiar to herself, and which should not be habitually brought into recollection by the incidents of every day, might be expected to be less and less thought of, till at length it should be almost wholly forgotten. Still more might this be naturally expected to become the case, if the peculiarities in question should be, from their very nature, at war with pride and luxury and worldly-mindedness, the too general concomitants of rapidly increasing wealth: and this would be the more likely to happen (particularly among the laity) if the circumstance of their having been at any time abused to purposes of hypocrisy or fanaticism should have prompted even some of the better disposed of the clergy (perhaps from well-intentioned though erroneous motives) to bring them forward less frequently in their discourses on religion.

When so many should thus have been straying out of the right path, some bold informer might, from time to time, be likely to arise, who should not unjustly charge them with their deviation; but though right perhaps in the main, yet deviating himself also in an opposite direction, and creating disgust by his violence, or vulgarity, or absurdities, he might fail, except in a few instances, to produce the effect of recalling them from their wanderings.

Still, however, the divine original of Christianity would not be professedly disavowed; but, partly from a real, partly from a political deference for the established faith, but most of all, from men being not yet prepared to reject it as an imposture, some respect would still be entertained for it. Some bolder spirits, indeed, might be expected to despise the cautious moderation of these timid reasoners, and to pronounce decisively that the Bible was a forgery; while the generality, professing to believe it genuine, should, less consistently, be satisfied with remaining ignorant of its contents; and, when pressed, should discover themselves by no means to believe several of the most important particulars contained in it.

When, by the operation of causes like these, any country has at length grown into the condition which has been here stated, it is but too obvious, that, in the bulk of the community, religion, already sunk very low, must be hastening fast to her entire dissolution. Causes energetic and active like these, though accidental hinderances may occasionally thwart their operation, will not ever become sluggish and unproductive. Their effect is sure; and the time is fast approaching, when Christianity will be almost as openly disavowed in the language, as in fact it is already supposed to have disappeared from the conduct of men; when infidelity will be held to be the necessary appendage of a man of fashion, and to believe will be deemed the indication of a feeble mind and a contracted understanding.

Something like what have been here premised are the conjectures which we should naturally be led to form concerning the state of Christianity in this country and its probable issue, from considering her own nature, and the peculiar circumstances in which she has been placed. That her real condition differs not much from the result of this reasoning from probability, must, with whatever regret, be confessed by all who take a careful and impartial survey of the actual situation of things among us. But our hypothetical delineation, if just, will have approved itself to the reader's conviction, as we have gone along, by suggesting its archetypes; and we may therefore be spared the painful and invidious task of pointing out, in detail, the several particulars wherein our statements are justified by facts. Everywhere we may actually trace the effects of increasing wealth and luxury, in banishing one by one the habits, and new-modeling the phraseology, of stricter times; and in diffusing throughout the middle ranks those relaxed morals and dissipated manners which were formerly confined to the higher classes of society. We meet indeed with more refinement, and with more of those amiable courtesies which are its proper fruits: those vices also have become less frequent which naturally infest the darkness of a ruder and less polished age, and which recede on the approach of light and civilization.

*Defluxit numerus Saturnius, et grave virus
Munditie pepulere.*

But, on the other hand, with these grossnesses, religion also has declined: God is forgotten; his providence is exploded: his hand is lifted up, but we see it not; he multiplies our comforts, but we are not grateful; he visits us with chastisements, but we are not contrite. The portion of the week set apart to the service of religion, we give up, without reluctance, to vanity and dissipation. And it is much if, on the periodical return of a day of national humiliation, we do not avail ourselves of the certainty of an interval from public business to secure a meeting for convivial purposes; thus insulting the Majesty of Heaven, and deliberately disclaiming our being included in the solemn services of this season of penitence and recollection.

But even when there is not this open and shameless disavowal of religion, few traces of it are to be found. Improving in almost every other branch of knowledge, we have become less and less acquainted with Christianity. The preceding chapters have pointed out, among those who believe themselves to be orthodox Christians, a deplorable ignorance of the religion they profess, an utter forgetfulness of the peculiar doctrines by which it is characterized, a disposition to regard it as a mere system of ethics, and, what might seem an inconsistency, at the same time a most inadequate idea of the nature and strictness of its practical principles. This declension of Christianity into a mere system of ethics may partly be accounted for (as has been lately suggested) by considering what Christianity is, and in what circumstances she has been placed in this country. But it has also been considerably promoted by one peculiar cause, on which, for many reasons, it may not be improper to dwell a little more particularly.

Christianity in its best days (for the credit of our representations we wish this to be remembered by all who object to our statement as austere and contracted) was such as it has been delineated in the present work. This was the religion of the most eminent reformers, of those bright ornaments of our country who suffered martyrdom under Queen Mary; of their successors in the times of Elizabeth; in short, of all the pillars of our Protestant church; of many of its highest dignitaries; of Davenant, of Jewell, of Hall, of Reynolds, of Beveridge, of Hooker, of Andrews, of Smith, of Leighton, of Usher, of Hopkins, of Baxter,* and of many others of scarcely inferior

* I must here express my unfeigned and high respect for this great man, who, with his brethren, was so shamefully ejected from the church, in 1666, in violation of the royal word, as well as of the clear principles of justice. With his controversial pieces I am little acquainted; but his practical writings, in four massy folios, are a treasury of Christian wisdom; and it would be a most valuable service to mankind to revise them, and perhaps to note. In their pages the peculiar doctrines of Christianity were everywhere visible, and on the deep and solid basis of these doctrinal truths were laid the foundations of a superstructure of morals proportionably broad and exalted. Of this fact, their writings still extant are a decisive proof; and they who may want leisure or opportunity or inclination for the perusal of these valuable records, may satisfy themselves of the truth of the assertion, that such as we have stated it was the Christianity of those times, by consulting our Articles and Homilies, or even by carefully examining our excellent Liturgy. But from that tendency to deterioration lately noticed, these great fundamental truths began to be somewhat less prominent in the compositions of many of the leading divines before the time of the civil wars. During that period, however, the peculiar doctrines abridge them, so as to render them more suited to the taste of modern readers. This has been already done in the case of his 'Dying Thoughts,' a beautiful little piece, and of his 'Saints' Rest.' His Life also, written by himself, and in a separate volume, contains much useful matter, and many valuable particulars of the history of the times of Charles I, Cromwell, &c.—I take the earliest opportunity which is offered me, by the publication of a new edition of the 'Practical View,' &c., of correcting an error which has been pointed out in the 'Christian Remembrancer' for February and March last. It was certainly incorrect to describe Mr. Baxter as a member of the Church of England; since, though I believe he differed little, if at all, from the English Church in matters of doctrine or principle, he urged many objections against her discipline and formularies,—objections, some of which, with all the reverence I feel for his character, I cannot but consider as unworthy of so great a man. I cannot, however, forbear expressing my regret, that the writer of the 'Remarks on Baxter's Life,' in the article in question, should have appeared to feel so little reverence for a man, of whom, notwithstanding some alloy of human infirmities, it may perhaps be truly affirmed, that the writings of few if any uninspired men have been the instruments of such extensive benefit to mankind as those of Mr. Baxter.

of Christianity were grievously abused by many of the sectaries, who were foremost in the commotions of those unhappy days; who, while they talked copiously of the free grace of Christ, and the operations of the Holy Spirit, were, by their lives, an open scandal to the name of Christian.*

Towards the close of the last century, the divines of the Established Church (whether it arose from the obscurity of their own views, or from a strong impression of former abuses, and of the evils which had resulted from them) began to run into a different error. They professed to make it their chief object to inculcate the moral and practical precepts of Christianity, which they conceived to have been before too

* Let me by no means be understood to censure all the sectaries without discrimination. Many of them, and some who, by the unhappy circumstances of the times, became objects of notice in a political view, were men of great erudition, deep views of religion, and unquestionable piety. And though the writings of the Puritans are prolix, and, according to the fashion of the age, rendered rather perplexed than clear, by multiplied divisions and subdivisions, yet they are a mine of wealth, in which any one, who will submit to some degree of labour, will find himself well rewarded for his pains. In particular, the writings of Dr. Owen, Mr. Howe, and Mr. Flavel, well deserve this character. Of the first mentioned author, there are two pieces which I would especially recommend to the reader's perusal: one, on Heavenly Mindedness, abridged by Dr. Mayo; the other, on the Mortification of sin in Believers.—While I have been speaking in terms of such high, and I trust such just, eulogium of many of the teachers of the Church of England, this may not be an improper place to express the high obligations which we owe to the Dissenters for many excellent publications. Of this number are Dr. Evans' Sermons on the Christian Temper; and that most useful book, the Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, by Dr. Doddridge; also his Life, by Orton, and Letters; and two volumes of Sermons, one on Regeneration, the other on the Power and Grace of Christ.—May the writer be permitted to embrace this opportunity of recommending two volumes, published separately, of Sermons, by the late Dr. Witherspoon, President of the College of New Jersey?

much neglected; but without sufficiently maintaining, often even without justly laying, the grand foundation of a sinner's acceptance with God, or pointing out how the practical precepts of Christianity grow out of her peculiar doctrines, and are inseparably connected with them.* By this fatal error, the very genius and essential nature of Christianity was imperceptibly changed. She no longer retained her peculiar characters, or produced that appropriate frame of spirit by which her followers had been characterized. Facilis descensus. The example thus set was followed during the present century, and its effect was aided by various causes already pointed out. In addition to these, it may be proper to mention, as a cause of powerful operation, that, for the last fifty years, the press has teemed with moral essays, many of them published periodically, and most extensively circulated; which, being considered either as works of mere entertainment, or in which at least entertainment was to be blended with instruction, rather than as religious pieces, were kept free from whatever might give them the air of sermons, or cause them to wear an appearance of seriousness inconsistent with the idea of relaxation. But in this way the fatal habit of considering Christian morals as distinct from Christian doctrines insensibly gained strength. Thus the peculiar doctrines of Christianity went more and more out of sight: and, as might naturally have been expected, the moral system itself also, being robbed of that which should have supplied it with life and nutriment, began to wither and decay. At length, in our own days, these peculiar doctrines have almost altogether vanished from the view. Even in the greater number of our sermons scarcely any traces of them are to be found.

* See Section vi of the Fourth Chapter, where we have expressly and fully treated of this most important truth.

But the degree of neglect into which they are really fallen may perhaps be rendered still more manifest by appealing to another criterion. There is a certain class of publications, of which it is the object to give us exact delineations of life and manners: and when these are written by authors of accurate observation and deep knowledge of human nature, (and many such there have been in our times,) they furnish a more faithful picture than can be obtained in any other way, of the prevalent opinions and feelings of mankind. It must be obvious that novels are here alluded to. A careful perusal of the most celebrated of these pieces would furnish a strong confirmation of the apprehension, suggested from other considerations, concerning the very low state of religion in this country; but they would still more strikingly illustrate the truth of the remark, that the grand peculiarities of Christianity are almost vanished from the view. In a sermon, although throughout the whole of it there may have been no traces of these peculiarities, either directly or indirectly, the preacher closes with an ordinary form; which, if one were to assert that they were absolutely omitted, would immediately be alleged in contradiction of the assertion, and may just serve to protect them from falling into entire oblivion. But in novels the writer is not so tied down. In these, people of religion, and clergymen too, are placed in all possible situations, and the sentiments and language deemed suitable to the occasion are assigned to them. They are introduced instructing, reproving, counseling, comforting. It is often the author's intention to represent them in a favourable point of view, and accordingly he makes them as well informed and as good Christians as he knows how. They are painted amiable, benevolent, and forgiving; but it is not too much to say, that if the peculiarities of Christianity had never existed, or had all been proved to be false, the circumstance would scarcely create the necessity of altering a single syllable in any of the most celebrated of these performances. It is striking to observe the difference which there is in this respect in similar works of Mahometan authors, wherein the characters which they mean to represent in a favourable light are drawn vastly more observant of the peculiarities of their religion.*

It has also been a melancholy prognostic of the state to which we are progressive, that many of the most eminent of the literati of modern times have been professed unbelievers; and that others of them have discovered such lukewarmness in the cause of Christ, as to treat with especial goodwill and attention and respect those men who, by their avowed publications, were openly assailing or insidiously undermining the very foundations of the Christian hope; considering themselves as more closely united to them by literature than severed from them by the widest religious differences.† Can it then occasion surprise

* No exceptions have fallen within my own reading, but the writings of Richardson.

† It is with pain that the author finds himself compelled to place so great a writer as Dr. Robertson in this class. But, to say nothing of his phlegmatic account of the Reformation; (a that, under all these circumstances, one of the most acute and most forward of the professed unbelievers* should appear to anticipate, as at no great distance, the more complete triumph of his sceptical principles; and that another author of distinguished name,† not so openly professing those infidel opinions, should declare of the writer above alluded to, whose great abilities had been systematically prostituted to the open attack of every principle of religion, both natural and revealed, “that he had always considered him, both in his lifetime and since his death, as approaching as nearly to the idea of a perfectly wise and virtuous man as perhaps the nature of human frailty will permit?”

Can there then be a doubt, whither tends the path in which we are traveling, and whither at length it must conduct us? If any should hesitate, let them take a lesson from experience. In a neighbouring subject which we would have thought likely to excite, in any one who united the character of a Christian divine with that of a historian, some warmth of pious gratitude for the good providence of God;) to pass over also the ambiguity in which he leaves his readers as to his opinion of the authenticity of the Mosaic chronology, in his Disquisitions on the Trade of India; his Letters to Mr. Gibbon, lately published, cannot but excite emotions of regret and shame in every sincere Christian. The author hopes, that he has so far explained his sentiments as to render it almost unnecessary to remark, what, however, to prevent misconception, he must here declare, that, so far from approving, he must be understood decidedly to condemn, a hot, a contentious, much more an abusive manner of opposing or of speaking of the assailants of Christianity. The apostle's direction in this respect cannot be too much attended to—“The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all men; apt to teach, patient; in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth.” (2 Tim. ii, 24, 25.)

* Mr. Hume.

† See Dr. A. Smith's Letter to W. Strahan, E-q.

country, several of the same causes have been in action, and they have at length produced their full effect ; manners corrupted, morals depraved, dissipation predominant, above all, religion discredited, and infidelity, grown into repute and fashion,* terminating in the public disavowal of every religious principle which had been used to attract the veneration of mankind ; the representatives of a whole nation publicly witnessing, not only without horror, but without the smallest disapprobation, an open unqualified denial of the very existence of God ; and at length, as a body, withdrawing their allegiance from the Majesty of Heaven.

There are not a few, perhaps, who may have witnessed with apprehension, and may be ready to confess with pain, the gradual declension of religion ; but who, at the same time, may conceive that the writer of this tract is disposed to carry things too far. They may even allege, that the degree of religion for which he contends is inconsistent with the ordinary business of life, and with the wellbeing of society ; that if it were generally to prevail, people would be wholly engrossed by religion, and all their time occupied by prayer and preaching ;—men not being sufficiently interested in the pursuit of temporal objects, agriculture and commerce would decline, the arts would languish, the very duties of common life would be neglected ; and, in short, the whole machine of civil society would be obstructed, and speedily

* What is here stated must be acknowledged by all, be their political opinions concerning French events what they may ; and it makes no difference in the writer's view of the subject, whether the state of morals was or was not quite or nearly as bad before the French Revolution.

stopped. An opening for this charge is given by an ingenious writer,* alluded to in an early period of our work: and is even somewhat countenanced by an author since referred to, from whom such a sentiment justly excites more surprise.†

In reply to this objection, it might be urged, that though we should allow it for a moment to be in a considerable degree well founded, yet this admission would not warrant the conclusion intended to be drawn from it. The question would still remain, whether our representation of what Christianity requires be agreeable to the word of God? For if it be, surely it must be confessed to be a matter of small account to sacrifice a little worldly comfort and prosperity, during the short span of our existence in this life, in order to secure a crown of eternal glory, and the enjoyment of those pleasures which are at God's right hand for evermore. It might be added, also, that our blessed Saviour had plainly declared, that it would often be required of Christians to make such a sacrifice; and had forewarned us, that in order to be able to do it with cheerfulness, whenever the occasion should arrive, we must habitually sit loose to all worldly possessions and enjoyments. And it might further be remarked, that though it were even admitted, that the general prevalence of vital Christianity should somewhat interfere with the views of national wealth and aggrandizement, yet that there is too much reason to believe, that, do all we can, this general prevalence needs not to be apprehended, or, to speak more justly, could not be hoped for. But indeed the objection on which we have now been commenting, is not only groundless, but directly contrary to truth. If Christianity, such as we have represented it, were generally to prevail, the world, from being such as it is, would become a scene of general peace and prosperity; and, abating the chances and calamities “which flesh is inseparably heir to,” would wear one uniform face of complacency and joy.

* Soame Jenyns.

† Paley's Evidences.

On the first promulgation of Christianity, it is true, some of her early converts seem to have been in danger of so far mistaking the genius of the new religion, as to imagine, that in future they were to be discharged from an active attendance on their secular affairs. But the apostle most pointedly guarded them against so gross an error, and expressly and repeatedly enjoined them to perform the particular duties of their several stations with increased alacrity and fidelity, that they might thereby do credit to their Christian profession. This he did, at the same time that he prescribed to them that predominant love of God and of Christ, that heavenly-mindedness, that comparative indifference to the things of this world, that earnest endeavour after growth in grace and perfection in holiness, which have already been stated as the essential characteristics of real Christianity. It cannot therefore be supposed, by any who allow to the apostle even the claim of a consistent instructor, much less by any who admit his divine authority, that these latter precepts are incompatible with the former. Let it be remembered, that the grand characteristic mark of the true Christian, which has been insisted on, is his desiring to please God in all his thoughts and words and actions; to take the revealed word to be the rule of his belief and practice; to “let his light shine before men;” and in all things to adorn the doctrine which he professes. No calling is proscribed, no pursuit is forbidden, no science or art is prohibited, no pleasure is disallowed, provided it be such as can be reconciled with this principle. It must indeed be confessed, that Christianity would not favour that vehemence and inordinate ardour in the pursuit of temporal objects, which tends to the acquisition of immense wealth, or of widely-spread renown; nor is it calculated to gratify the extravagant views of those mistaken politicians, the chief object of whose admiration, and the main scope of whose endeavours for their country, are extended dominion and commanding power and unrivaled affluence, rather than those more solid advantages of peace and comfort and security. These men would barter comfort for greatness. In their vain reverses, they forget that a nation consists of individuals, and that true national prosperity is no other than the multiplication of particular happiness.

But, in fact, so far is it from being true, that the prevalence of real religion would produce a stagnation in life, it would infallibly produce the very reverse: a man, whatever might be his employment or pursuit, would be furnished with a new motive to prosecute it with alacrity,—a motive far more constant and vigorous than any which merely human prospects can supply; at the same time, his solicitude being not so much to succeed in whatever he might be engaged in, as to act from a pure principle, and leave the event to God, he would not be liable to the same disappointments as men who are active and laborious from a desire of wordly gain or of human estimation. Thus he would possess the true secret of a life at the same time useful and happy. Following peace also with all men, and looking upon them as members of the same family, entitled not only to the debts of justice, but to the less definite and more liberal claims of fraternal kindness, he would naturally be respected and beloved by others, and be in himself free from the annoyance of those bad passions by which they who are actuated by worldly principles are so commonly corroded. If any country were indeed filled with men, each thus diligently discharging the duties of his own station without breaking in upon the rights of others, but on the contrary endeavouring, so far as he might be able, to forward their views, and promote their happiness—all would be active and harmonious in the goodly frame of human society. There would be no jarrings, no discord. The whole machine of civil life would work without obstruction or disorder, and the course of its movements would be like the harmony of the spheres.

Such would be the happy state of a truly Christian nation within itself. Nor would its condition with regard to foreign countries form a contrast to this its internal comfort. Such a community, on the contrary, peaceful at home, would be respected and beloved abroad. General integrity in all its dealings would inspire universal confidence; differences between nations commonly arise from mutual injuries, and still more from mutual jealousy and distrust. Of the former there would be no longer any ground for complaint; the latter would find nothing to attach upon. But if, in spite of all its justice and forbearance, the violence of some neighbouring state should force it to resist an unprovoked attack, (for hostilities strictly defensive are those only in which it would be engaged,) its domestic union would double its national force; while the consciousness of a good cause, and of the general favour of Heaven, would invigorate its arm, and inspirit its efforts.

It is indeed the position of an author, to whom we have had frequent occasion to refer, and whose love of paradox has not seldom led him into error, that true Christianity is an enemy to patriotism. If by patriotism is meant that mischievous and domineering quality which renders men ardent to promote, not the happiness, but the aggrandizement of their own country, by the oppression and conquest of every other; to such patriotism, so generally applauded in the heathen world, that religion must be indeed an enemy whose foundation is justice and whose compendious character is "peace and goodwill towards men." But if by patriotism be understood that quality which, without shutting up our philanthropy within the narrow bounds of a single kingdom, yet attaches us in particular to the country to which we belong; of this true patriotism, Christianity is the most copious source, and the surest preservative. The contrary opinion can indeed only have arisen from not considering the fulness and universality of our Saviour's precepts. Not like the puny productions of human workmanship, (which at the best can commonly serve but the particular purpose that they are specially designed to answer;) the moral, as well as the physical principles established by the great Governor of the universe are capable of being applied at once to ten thousand different uses : thus, amidst infinite complication, preserving a grand simplicity, and therein bearing the unambiguous stamp of their divine original. Thus, to specify one out of the numberless instances which might be adduced—the principle of gravitation, while it is subservient to all the mechanical purposes of common life, keeps at the same time the stars in their courses, and maintains the harmony of worlds.

Thus also in the case before us : society consists of a number of different circles of various magnitudes and uses, and that circumstance, wherein the principle of patriotism chiefly consists, whereby the duty of patriotism is best practised, and the happiest effects upon the general weal are produced, is, that it should be the desire and aim of every individual to fill well his own proper circle, (as a part and member of the whole,) with a view to the production of general happiness. This our Saviour enjoined when he prescribed the duty of universal love, which is but another term for the most exalted patriotism. Benevolence, indeed, when not originating in religion, dispenses but from a scanty and precarious fund : and therefore, if it be liberal in the case of some objects, it is generally found to be contracted towards others. Men who, acting from worldly principles, make the greatest stir about general philanthropy or zealous patriotism, are often very deficient in their conduct in domestic life ; and very neglectful of the opportunities, fully within their reach, of promoting the comfort of those with whom they are immediately connected. But true Christian benevolence is always occupied in producing happiness to the utmost of its power, and according to the extent of its sphere, be it larger or more limited; it contracts itself to the measure of the smallest; it can expand itself to the amplitude of the largest. It resembles majestic rivers, which are poured from an unfailing and abundant source. Silent and peaceful in their course, they begin with dispensing beauty and comfort to every cottage by which they pass. In their further progress, they fertilize provinces and enrich kingdoms. At length they pour themselves into the ocean; where, changing their names, but not their nature, they visit distant nations and other hemispheres, and spread, throughout the world, the expansive tide of their beneficence.

It must be confessed, that many of the good effects of which religion is productive to political societies would be productive even by a false religion, which should prescribe good morals, and should be able to enforce its precepts by sufficient sanctions. Of this nature are those effects which depend on our calling in the aid of a Being who sees the heart, in order to assist the weakness, and in various ways to supply the inherent defects, of all human jurisprudence. But the superior excellence of Christianity in this respect must be acknowledged, both in the superiority of her moral code, and in the powerful motives and efficacious means which she furnishes for enabling us to practise it; and in the tendency of her doctrines to provide for the observance of her precepts, by producing tempers of mind which correspond with them.

But more than all this, it has not perhaps been enough remarked, that true Christianity, from her essential nature, appears peculiarly and powerfully adapted to promote the preservation and healthfulness of political communities. What is in truth their grand malady? The answer is short—Selfishness. This is that young disease received at the moment of their birth, “which grows with their growth, and strengthens with their strength;” and through which they at length expire, if not cut off prematurely by some external shock or intestine convulsion.

The disease of selfishness, indeed, assumes different forms in the different classes of society. In the great and the wealthy, it displays itself in luxury, in pomp and parade, and in all the frivolities of a sickly and depraved imagination, which seeks in vain its own gratification, and is dead to the generous and energetic pursuits of an enlarged heart. In the lower orders, when not motionless under the weight of a superencumbent despotism, it manifests itself in pride, and its natural offspring, insubordination in all its modes. But though the external effects may vary, the internal principle is the same; a disposition in each individual to make self the grand centre and end of his desires and enjoyments; to overrate his own merits and importance, and of course to magnify his claims on others, and to underrate theirs on him; a disposition to undervalue the advantages and overstate the disadvantages of his condition in life. Thence spring rapacity and venality and sensuality. Thence imperious nobles and factious leaders; thence also an unruly commonalty, bearing with difficulty the inconveniences of a lower station, and imputing to the nature or administration of their government the evils which necessarily flow from the very constitution of our species, or which perhaps are chiefly the result of their own vices and follies. The opposite to selfishness is public spirit; which may be termed, not unjustly, the grand principle of political vitality, the very life's breath of states, which tends to keep them active and vigorous, and to carry them to greatness and glory.

The tendency of public spirit, and the opposite tendency of selfishness, have not escaped the observation of the founders of states, or of the writers on government; and various expedients have been resorted to and extolled, for cherishing the one, and for repressing the other. Sometimes a principle of internal agitation and dissension, resulting from the very frame of the government, has been productive of the effect. Sparta flourished for more than seven hundred years under the civil institutions of Lycurgus; which guarded against the selfish principle by prohibiting commerce, and imposing universal poverty and hardship. The Roman commonwealth, in which public spirit was cherished, and selfishness checked, by the principle of the love of glory, was also of long continuance. This passion naturally operates to produce an unbounded spirit of conquest, which, like the ambition of the greatest of its own heroes, was never satiated while any other kingdom was left to be subdued. The principle of political vitality, when kept alive only by means like these, merits the description once given of eloquence: "Sicut flamma, materia alitur, et motibus excitatur, et urendo clarescit." But like eloquence, when no longer called into action by external causes, or fomented by civil broils, it gradually languishes. Wealth and luxury produce stagnation, and stagnation terminates in death.

To provide, however, for the continuance of a state, by the admission of internal dissensions, or even by the chilling influence of poverty, seems to be in some sort sacrificing the end to the means. Happiness is the end for which men unite in civil society; but in societies thus constituted, little happiness, comparatively speaking, is to be found. The expedient, again, of preserving a state by the spirit of conquest, though even this has not wanted its admirers,* is not to be tolerated for a moment, when considered on principles of universal justice. Such a state lives and grows and thrives by the misery of others, and becomes professedly the general enemy of its neighbours, and the scourge of the human race. All these devices are in truth but too much like the fabrications of man, when compared with the works of the supreme Being; clumsy, yet weak in the execution of their purpose, and full of contradictory principles and jarring movements.

I might here enlarge with pleasure on the unrivaled excellence, in this very view, of the constitution under which we live in this happy country; and point out how, more perhaps than any which ever existed upon earth, it is so framed, as to provide at the same time for keeping up a due degree of public spirit, and yet for preserving unimpaired the quietness and comfort and charities of private life; how it even extracts from selfishness itself many of the advantages which, under less happily constructed forms of government, public spirit only can supply.

* See especially that great historian, Ferguson, who, in his Essay on Civil Society, endeavours to vindicate the cause of heroism from the censure conveyed by the poet :

“From Macedonia’s madman to the Swede.”

But such a political discussion, however grateful to a British mind, would here be out of place. It is rather our business to remark, how much Christianity in every way sets herself in direct hostility to selfishness, the moral distemper of political communities; and consequently, how their welfare must be inseparable from her prevalence. It might indeed be almost stated as the main object, and chief concern of Christianity, to root out our natural selfishness, to rectify the false standard which it imposes on us, and to bring us not only to a just estimate of ourselves and of all around us, but to a due impression also of the various claims and obligations resulting from the different relations in which we stand. Benevolence, enlarged, vigorous, operative benevolence, is her master-principle. Moderation in temporal pursuits and enjoyments, comparative indifference to the issue of worldly projects, diligence in the discharge of personal and civil duties, resignation to the will of God, and patience under all the dispensations of his providence, are among her daily lessons. Humility is one of the essential qualities which her precepts most directly and strongly enjoin, and which all her various doctrines tend to call forth and cultivate; and humility lays the deepest and surest grounds for benevolence. In whatever class or order of society Christianity prevails, she sets herself to rectify the particular faults, or, if we would speak more distinctly, to counteract the particular mode of selfishness to which that class is liable. Affluence she teaches to be liberal and beneficent; authority, to bear its faculties with meekness, and to consider the various cares and obligations belonging to its elevated station, as being conditions on which that station is conferred. Thus, softening the glare of wealth, and moderating the insolence of power, she renders the inequalities of the social state less galling to the lower orders, whom also she instructs, in their turn, to be diligent, humble, patient; reminding them that their more lowly path has been allotted to them by the hand of God; that it is their part faithfully to discharge its duties, and contentedly to bear its inconveniences; that the present state of things is very short; that the objects about which worldly men conflict so eagerly are not worth the contest; that the peace of mind which religion offers indiscriminately to all ranks affords more true satisfaction than all the expensive pleasures which are beyond the poor man's reach; that in this view the poor have the advantage; that, if their superiors enjoy more abundant comforts, they are also exposed to many temptations from which the inferior classes are happily exempted; that, "having food and raiment, they should therewith be content," since their situation in life, with all its evils, is better than they have deserved at the hand of God; and finally, that all human distinctions will soon be done away, and the true followers of Christ will all, as children of the same Father, be alike admitted to the possession of the same heavenly inheritance. Such are the blessed effects of Christianity on the temporal wellbeing of political communities.

But the Christianity which can produce effects like these must be real, not nominal; deep, not superficial. Such therefore is the religion we should cultivate, if we would realize these pleasing speculations, and arrest the progress of political decay. But, in the present circumstances of this country, a further reason for cultivating this vital Christianity, (still considering it merely in a political view,) is that, according to all human appearance, we must either have this or none; unless the prevalence of this be in some degree restored, we are likely, not only to lose all the advantages which we might have derived from true Christianity, but to incur all the manifold evils which would result from the absence of all religion.

In the first place, let it be remarked, that a weakly principle of religion, which in a political view might be productive of many advantages, though its existence may be prolonged, if all external circumstances favour its continuance, can hardly be kept alive, when the state of things is so unfavourable to vital religion, as in our condition of society it appears to be. Nor is it merely the ordinary effects of a state of wealth and prosperity to which we here allude. Much also may justly be apprehended from that change which has taken place in our general habits of thinking and feeling, concerning the systems and opinions of former times. At a less advanced period of society, indeed, the religion of the state will be generally accepted, though it be not felt in its vital power. It was the religion of our forefathers; with the bulk, it is on that account entitled to reverence; and its authority is admitted without question. The establishment in which it subsists pleads the same prescription, and sustains the same respect. But, in our days, things are very differently circumstanced. Not merely the blind prejudice in favour of former times, but even the proper respect for them, and the reasonable presumption in their favour, has abated. Still less will the idea be endured, of upholding a manifest imposture, for the sake of retaining the common people in subjection. A system, if not supported by a real persuasion of its truth, will fall to the ground. Thus it not unfrequently happens, that, in a more advanced state of society, a religious establishment must be indebted for its support to that very religion which in earlier times it fostered and protected; as the weakness of some aged mother is sustained, and her existence lengthened, by the tender assiduities of the child whom she had reared in the helplessness of infancy. So, in the present instance, unless there be reinfused into the mass of our society, something of that principle which animated our ecclesiastical system in its earlier days, it is vain for us to hope that the establishment will very long continue: for an establishment, the actual principles of whose members, and even teachers, are, for the most part, so extremely different from those which it professes, is an anomaly which will not much longer be borne. But in proportion as vital Christianity can be revived, in that same proportion the church establishment is strengthened; for the revival of vital Christianity is the very reinfusion of which we have been speaking. This is the very Christianity on which our establishment is founded, and that which her Articles and Homilies and Liturgy teach throughout.

But if, when the reign of prejudice, and even of honest prepossession, and of grateful veneration, is no more, (for by these almost any system may generally be supported, before a state, having passed the period of its maturity, is verging to its decline,) it be thought, that a dry, unanimated religion, like that which is now professed by nominal Christians, can hold its place, and much more, that it can be revived among the general mass of mankind—it may be affirmed, that, arguing merely on human principles, they know little of human nature. The kind of religion which we have recommended, independent of all consideration either of the grace which it imparts, or even of its truth, must at least be conceded to be that which is most of all suited to make an impression upon the lower orders, since it so strongly interests all the passions of the human mind. If it be thought that a system of ethics may regulate the conduct of the higher classes, such a one is altogether unsuitable to the lower, who must be wrought upon by their affections, or they will not be wrought upon at all. The ancients were wiser than ourselves, and never thought of governing the community in general by their lessons of philosophy. These lessons were confined to the schools of the learned; while, for the million, a system of religion, such as it was, was kept up, as alone adapted to their grosser natures.

If this reasoning fail to convince, we may safely appeal to experience. Let the Socinian and the moral teacher of Christianity come forth, and tell us what effects they have produced on the lower orders. They themselves will hardly deny the inefficacy of their instructions. But, blessed be God, the religion which we recommend has proved its correspondence with the character originally given of Christianity, that it was calculated for the poor: it has proved this, I say, by changing the whole condition of the mass of society in many of the most populous districts in this and other countries; and by bringing them from a state of almost unexampled wickedness and barbarism, to a state of sobriety, decency, industry, and, in short, to whatever can render men useful members of civil society.

If indeed, through the blessing of Providence, a principle of true religion should in any considerable degree gain ground, there is no estimating the effects on public morals, and the consequent influence on our political welfare. These effects are not merely negative: though it would be much merely to check the further progress of a gangrene, which is eating out the very vitals of our social and political existence. The general standard of morality, formerly described, would be raised—it would at least be sustained and kept for awhile from further depression. The esteem which religious characters would personally attract, would extend to the system which they should hold, and to the establishment of which they should be members. These are all merely natural consequences. But to those who believe in a superintending Providence, it may be added, that the blessing of God might be drawn down upon our country, and the stroke of his anger be for a while suspended.

Let us be spared the painful task of tracing, on the contrary, the fatal consequences of the extinction of religion among us. They are indeed such as no man, who is ever so little interested for the welfare of his country, can contemplate without the deepest concern. The very loss of our church establishment, though, as in all human institutions, some defects may be found in it, would in itself be attended with the most fatal consequences. No prudent man dares hastily pronounce, that its destruction might not greatly endanger our civil institutions. It would not be difficult to prove, that the want of it would also be in the highest degree injurious to the cause of Christianity; and still more, that it would take away what appears from experience to be one of the most probable means of its revival. To what a degree might even the avowed principles of men, who are not altogether destitute of religion, decline, when our inestimable Liturgy should no longer remain in use!—a Liturgy justly inestimable, as setting before us a faithful model of the Christian's belief and practice and language: as restraining us (as far as restraint is possible) from excessive deviations; as furnishing us with abundant instruction when we would return into the right path; as affording an advantage-ground of no little value to such instructors as still adhere to the good old principles of the Church of England; in short, as daily shaming us, by preserving a living representation of the opinions and habits of better times, like some historical record which reproaches a degenerate posterity by exhibiting the worthier deeds of their progenitors. In such a state of things, to what a depth public morals might sink may be anticipated by those who consider what would then be the condition of society; who reflect, how bad principles and vicious conduct mutually aid each other's operation, and how, in particular, the former make sure the ground which the latter may have gained; who remember that, in the lower orders, that system of honour and that responsibility of character are wanting, which, in the superior classes, supply in some poor degree the place of higher principles. It is well for the happiness of mankind, that such a community could not long subsist. The cement of society being no more, the state would soon be dissolved into individuality.

Let it not be vainly imagined, that our state of civilization must prevent the moral degeneracy here threatened. A neighbouring nation has lately furnished a lamentable proof, that superior polish and refinement may well consist with a very large measure of depravity. But to appeal to a still more decisive instance : it may be seen in the history of the latter years of the most celebrated of the Pagan nations, that the highest degrees of civilization and refinement are by no means inseparable from the most shocking depravity of morals. The fact is certain, and the obvious inference with regard to ourselves cannot be denied. The cause of this strange phenomenon, (such it really appears to our view,) for which the natural corruption of man might hardly seem to account sufficiently, has been explained by an inspired writer. Speaking of the most polished nations of antiquity, he observes—"Because when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, and were not *solicitous to retain him in their knowledge, he gave them over to a reprobate mind." Let us then beware, and take warning from their example; let us not suffer our self-love to beguile us; let us not vainly persuade ourselves, that although prosperity and wealth may have caused us to relax a little too much in those more serious duties which regard our Maker, yet that we shall stop where we are; or, at least, that we can never sink into the same state of moral depravation. Doubtless we should sink as low, if God were to give up us also to our own imaginations. And what ground have we to think he will not? If we would reason justly, we should not compare ourselves with the state of the heathen world when at its worst, but with its state at that period when, for its forgetfulness of God, and its ingratitude towards him, it was suffered to fall, till at length it reached that worst, its ultimate point of depression. The heathens had only reason and natural conscience to direct them: we enjoy, superadded to these, the clear light of gospel revelation, and a distinct declaration of God's dealings with them, to be a lesson for our instruction. How then can we but believe, that if we, enjoying advantages so much superior to theirs, are alike forgetful of our kind Benefactor, we also shall be left to ourselves? and if so left, what reason can be assigned why we should not fall into the same enormities?

* Such seems to be the just rendering of the word which our Testament translates, "did not like to retain God in their knowledge."

What then is to be done? The inquiry is of the first importance, and the general answer to it is not difficult.—The causes and nature of the decay of religion and morals among us sufficiently indicate the course which, on principles of sound policy, it is in the highest degree expedient for us to pursue. The distemper of which, as a community, we are sick, should be considered rather as a moral than a political malady. How much has this been forgotten by the disputants of modern times! and, accordingly, how transient may be expected to be the good effects of the best of their publications! We should endeavour to tread back our steps. Every effort should be used to raise the depressed tone of public morals. This is a duty particularly encumbent on all who are in the higher walks of life ; and it is impossible not to acknowledge the obligations which in this respect we owe as a nation to those exalted characters whom God, in his undeserved mercy to us, still suffers to continue on the throne, and who set to their subjects a pattern of decency and moderation rarely seen in their elevated station.

But every person of rank and fortune and abilities should endeavour in like manner to exhibit a similar example, and recommend it to the imitation of the circle in which he moves. It has been the opinion of some well-meaning people, that by joining as far as they possibly could with innocence, in the customs and practices of irreligious men, they might soften the prejudices too frequently taken up against religion, of its being an austere, gloomy service; and thus secure a previous favourable impresion against any time, when they might have an opportunity of explaining or enforcing their sentiments. This is always a questionable, and, it is to be feared, a dangerous policy. Many mischievous consequences necessarily resulting from it might easily be enumerated. But it is a policy particularly unsuited to our inconsiderate and dissipated times, and to the lengths at which we are arrived. In these circumstances, the most likely means of producing the revulsion which is required, must be boldly to proclaim the distinction between the adherents of " God and Baal." The expediency of this conduct in our present situation is confirmed by another consideration, to which we have before had occasion to refer. It is this, that when men are aware that something of difficulty is to be effected, their spirits rise to the level of the encounter; they make up their minds to bear hardships and brave dangers, and to persevere in spite of fatigue and opposition: whereas in a matter which is regarded as of easy and ordinary operation, they are apt to slumber over their work, and to fail in what a small effort might have been sufficient to accomplish, for want of having called up the requisite degree of energy and spirit. Conformably to the principle which is hereby suggested, in the circumstances in which we are placed, the line of demarcation between the friends and the enemies of religion should now be made clear; the separation should be broad and obvious. Let him, then, who wishes well to his country, no longer hesitate what course of conduct to pursue. The question now is not, in what liberties he might warrantably indulge himself in another situation; but, what are the restraints on himself which the exigencies of the present times render it advisable for him to impose? Circumstanced as we now are, it is more than ever obvious, that the best man is the truest patriot.

Nor is it only by their personal conduct, (though this mode will always be the most efficacious,) that men of authority and influence may promote the cause of good morals. Let them, in their several stations, encourage virtue and discountenance vice in others. Let them enforce the laws by which the wisdom of our forefathers has guarded against the grosser infractions of morals; and congratulate themselves, that, in a leading situation on the bench of justice there is placed a man who, to his honour be it spoken, is well disposed to assist their efforts.*

* It is a gratification to the writer's personal, as well as public

Let them favour and take part in any plans which may be formed for the advancement of morality. Above all things, let them endeavour to instruct and improve the rising generation; that, if it be possible, an antidote may be provided for the malignity of that venom which is storing up in a neighbouring country. This has long been to my mind the most formidable feature of the present state of things in France; where, it is to be feared, a brood of moral vipers, as it were, is now hatching, which, when they shall have attained to their mischievous maturity, will go forth to poison the world. But fruitless will be all attempts to sustain, much more to revive, the fainting cause of morals, unless you can in some degree restore the prevalence of evangelical Christianity. It is in morals as in physics: unless the source of practical principles be elevated, it will be in vain to attempt to make them flow on a high level in their future course. You may force them for a while into some constrained position, but they will soon drop to their natural point of depression. By all therefore who are studious of their country's welfare, more particularly by all who desire to support our ecclesiastical establishment, every effort should be used to revive the Christianity of our better days. The attempt should especially be made in the case of the pastors of the church, whose situation must render the principles which they hold a matter of super-eminent importance. Wherever these teachers have steadily and zealously inculcated the true doctrines of the Church of England, the happiest effects have commonly rewarded their labours. And it is worth feelings, to pay this tribute of respect to the character of Lord Chief Justice Kenyon.

observing, in the view which we are now taking, that these men, as might naturally be expected, are, perhaps without exception, friendly to our ecclesiastical and civil establishments;* and consequently, that their instructions and influence tend, directly as well as indirectly, to the maintenance of the cause of order and good government. If any, judging with the abstract coldness of mere politicians, doubt whether, by adopting the measures here recommended, such a religious warmth would not be called into action as might break out into mischievous irregularities—it may be well for them to recollect, what experience clearly proves, that an establishment, from its very nature, affords the happy means of exciting a considerable degree of fervour and animation, and at the same time tends to restrain them within due bounds. The duty of encouraging vital religion in the church particularly devolves on all who have the disposal of ecclesiastical preferment, and more especially on the dignitaries of the sacred order. Some of these have already sounded the alarm; justly censuring the practice of suffering Christianity to degenerate into a mere system of ethics, and recommending more attention to the peculiar doctrines of our religion. In our schools, in our universities, let encouragement be given to the study of the writings of those venerable divines who flourished in the purer times of Christianity. Let even a considerable proficiency in their writings be required of candidates for ordination. Let our churches no longer witness that unseemly discordance, which has too much prevailed, between the prayers which precede and the sermon which follows.

* This is not thrown out rashly, but asserted on the writer's own knowledge.

But it may be enough to have briefly hinted at the course of conduct which, in the present circumstances of this country, motives merely political should prompt us to pursue. To all who have at heart the national welfare, the above suggestions are solemnly submitted. They have not been urged altogether without misgivings, lest it should appear as though the concern of eternity were melted down into a mere matter of temporal advantage, or political expediency. But since it has graciously pleased the Supreme Being so to arrange the constitution of things as to render the prevalence of true religion and of pure morality conducive to the wellbeing of states, and the preservation of civil order—and since these subordinate inducements are not unfrequently held forth, even by the sacred writers—it seemed not improper, and scarcely liable to misconstruction, to suggest inferior motives to readers, who might be less disposed to listen to considerations of a higher order.

Would to God that the course of conduct here suggested might be fairly pursued! Would to God that the happy consequences which would result from the principles we have recommended, could be realized; and, above all, that the influence of true religion could be extensively diffused! It is the best wish which can be formed for his country, by one who is deeply anxious for its welfare—

Lucem redde tuam, dux bone, patriæ!
 Instar veris enim vultus ubi tuus Affulsit populo; gratior it dies,
 Et soles melius nitent.

CHAPTER VII.

PRACTICAL HINTS TO VARIOUS DESCRIPTIONS OF PERSONS.

THUS have we endeavoured to trace the chief defects of the religious system of the bulk of professed Christians in this country. We have pointed out their low idea of the importance of Christianity in general; their inadequate conceptions of all its leading doctrines, and the effect hereby naturally produced in relaxing the strictness of its practical system: more than all, we have remarked their grand fundamental misconception of its genius and essential nature. Let not therefore the difference between them and true believers be considered as a trifling difference; as a question of forms or opinions. The question is of the very substance of religion; the difference is of the most serious and momentous amount. We must speak out. Their Christianity is not Christianity. It wants the radical principle. It is mainly defective in all the grand constituents. Let them no longer then be deceived by names in a matter of infinite importance; but, with humble prayer to the Source of all wisdom, that he would enlighten their understandings, and clear their hearts from prejudice, let them seriously examine, by the Scripture standard, their real belief and allowed practice; and they will become sensible of the shallowness of their scanty system.

If, through the blessing of Providence on any thing which has been here written, any should feel themselves disposed to this important duty of self-inquiry, let me previously warn them to be well aware of our natural proneness to think too favourably of ourselves. Selfishness is one of the principal fruits of the corruption of human nature; and it is obvious that selfishness disposes us to overrate our good qualities, and to overlook or extenuate our defects. The corruption of human nature, therefore, being admitted, it follows undeniably, that in all our reckonings, if we would form a just estimate of our character, we must make an allowance for the effects of selfishness. It is also another effect of the corruption of human nature, to cloud our moral sight, and blunt our moral sensibility. Something must therefore be allowed for this effect likewise. Doubtless, the perfect purity of the Supreme Being makes him see in us stains far more in number and deeper in dye than we ourselves can discover. Nor should another awful consideration be forgotten. When we look into ourselves, those sins only into which we have lately fallen are commonly apt to excite any lively impression. Many individual acts of vice, or a continued course of vicious or dissipated conduct, which, when recent, may have smitten us with deep remorse, after a few months or years, leave but very faint traces in our recollection; at least, those acts alone continue to strike us strongly which were of very extraordinary magnitude. But the strong impressions which they at first excited, not the faded images which they subsequently present to us, furnish the juster measure of their guilt; and to the pure eyes of God, this guilt must always have appeared far greater than to us. Now, to the Supreme Being, we must believe that there is no past or future; as whatever will be, so whatever has been, is retained by him in present and unvarying contemplation, continuing always to appear just the same as at the first moment of its existence. Well may it then humble us in the sight of that Being "who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity," to remember that, unless through true repentance and lively faith we have obtained an interest in the satisfaction of Christ, we appear before him at this moment clothed with the sins of our whole lives, in all their original depth of colouring, and with all the aggravations which we no longer particularly remember; but which, in general, we perhaps may recollect to have once filled us with shame and confusion of face. The writer is the rather desirous of enforcing this reflection, because he can truly declare, that he has found no consideration so efficacious in producing in his own mind the deepest self-abasement.

In treating of the sources of the erroneous estimates which we form of our religious and moral character, it may not perhaps be without its uses to take this occasion of pointing out some other common springs of self-deception. Many persons, as was formerly hinted, are misled by the favourable opinions entertained of them by others: many, also, it is to be feared, mistake a hot zeal for orthodoxy, for a cordial acceptance of the great truths of the gospel; and almost all of us, at one time or other, are more or less misled, by confounding the suggestions of the understanding with the impulses of the will, the assent which our judgment gives to religious and moral truths with a hearty belief and approbation of them.

There is another frequent source of self-deception, which is productive of so much mischief in life that, though it may appear to lead to some degree of repetition, it would be highly improper to omit the mention of it in this place. That we may be the better understood, it may be proper to premise, that certain particular vices, and likewise certain particular good and amiable qualities, seem naturally to belong to certain particular periods and conditions of life. Now, if we would reason fairly in estimating our moral character, we ought to examine ourselves with reference to that particular "sin which does most easily beset us," not to some other sin to which we are not nearly so much liable. In like manner, on the other hand, we ought not to account it matter of much self-complacency, if we find in ourselves that good and amiable quality which naturally belongs to our period or condition; but rather look for some less ambiguous sign of a real internal principle of virtue. But we are very apt to reverse these rules of judging: we are apt, on the one hand, both in ourselves and in others, to excuse "the besetting sin," and take credit for being exempt from others, to which we are less liable; and, on the other hand, to value ourselves extremely on our possession of the good or amiable quality which naturally belongs to us, and to require no more satisfactory evidence of the sufficiency at least of our moral character. The bad effects of this partiality are aggravated by the practice, to which we are sadly prone, of being contented, when we take a hasty view of ourselves, with negative evidences of our state; thinking it very well if we are not shocked by some great actual transgression, instead of looking for the positive marks of a true Christian, as laid down in the holy Scripture.

But the source of self-deception, which it is more particularly our present object to point out, is a disposition to consider the relinquishment of any particular vice as an actual victory over the vice itself; when, in fact, we only forsake it on quitting the period or condition of life to which that vice belongs, and probably substitute for it the vice of the new period or condition on which we are entering. We thus mistake our merely outgrowing our vices, or relinquishing them from some change in our worldly circumstances, for a thorough or at least for a sufficient reformation.

But this topic deserves to be viewed a little more closely. Young people may, without much offence, be inconsiderate and dissipated; the youth of one sex may indulge occasionally in licentious excesses; those of the other may be supremely given up to vanity and pleasure; yet, provided that they are sweet-tempered and open, and not disobedient to their parents or other superiors, the former are deemed good-hearted young men, the latter innocent young women. Those who love them best have no solicitude about their spiritual interests; and it would be deemed strangely strict in themselves, or in others, to doubt of their becoming more religious as they advance in life; and still more, to speak of them as being actually under the Divine displeasure; or, if their lives should be in danger, to entertain any apprehensions concerning their future destiny.

They grow older, and marry. The same licentiousness, which was formerly considered in young men as a venial frailty, is now no longer regarded in the husband and the father as compatible with the character of a decently religious man. The language is of this sort: "They have sown their wild oats, they must now reform and be regular." Nor perhaps is the same manifest predominance of vanity and dissipation deemed innocent in the matron; but if they are kind respectively in their conjugal and parental relations, and are tolerably regular and decent, they pass for mighty good sort of people; and it would be altogether unnecessary scrupulosity in them to doubt of their coming up to the requisitions of the divine law, as far as in the present state of the world can be expected from human frailty. Their hearts, however, are perhaps no more than before supremely set on the great work of their salvation, but are chiefly bent on increasing their fortunes, or raising their families. Meanwhile they congratulate themselves on their having renounced vices, which they are no longer strongly tempted to commit, and the renunciation of which forms no just criterion of the religious principle, since the commission of them would prejudice their characters, and perhaps injure their prospects in life.

Old age has at length made its advances. Now, if ever, we might expect that it would be deemed high time to make eternal things the main object of attention. No such thing! There is still an appropriate good quality, the presence of which calms the disquietude, and satisfies the requisitions, both of themselves and of those around them. It is now required of them that they should be goodnatured, and cheerful, indulgent to the frailties and follies of the young; remembering, that when young themselves they gave in to the same practices. How opposite this to that dread of sin which is the sure characteristic of the true Christian; which causes him to look back upon the vices of his own youthful days with shame and sorrow; and which, instead of conceding to young people to be wild and thoughtless, as a privilege belonging to their age and circumstances, prompts him to warn them against what had proved to himself matter of such bitter reflection! Thus, throughout the whole of life, some means or other are devised for stifling the voice of conscience. “We cry peace, when there is no peace!” and both to ourselves and others that complacency is furnished, which ought only to proceed from a consciousness of being reconciled to God, and an humble hope of our possessing his favour.

I know that these sentiments will be termed uncharitable; but I must not be deterred by such an imputation. It is time to have done with that senseless cant of charity which insults the understandings and trifles with the feelings of those who are really concerned for the happiness of their fellow-creatures. What matter of keen remorse and of bitter self-reproaches are they storing up for their future torment who are themselves the miserable dupes of such misguided charity; or who, being charged with the office of watching over the eternal interests of their children or relations, suffer themselves to be lulled asleep by such shallow reasonings, or to be led into a dereliction of their important duty, by a fear of bringing on themselves a momentary pain ! Charity, indeed, is partial to the object of her regard ; and, where actions are of a doubtful quality, this partiality disposes her to refer them to a good rather than to a bad motive. She is apt also somewhat to exaggerate merits, and to see amiable qualities in a light more favourable than that which strictly belongs to them. But true charity is wakeful, fervent, full of solicitude, full of good offices, not so easily satisfied, not so ready to believe that every thing is going on well, as a matter of course ; but jealous of mischief, apt to suspect danger, and prompt to extend relief. These are the symptoms by which genuine regard will manifest itself in a wife or a mother, in the case of the bodily health of the object of her affections. And where there is any real concern for the spiritual interests of others, it is characterized by the same infallible marks. That wretched quality, by which the sacred name of charity is now so generally and so falsely usurped is no other than indifference ; which, against the plainest evidence, or at least where there is strong ground of apprehension, is easily contented to believe that all goes well, because it has no anxieties to allay, no fears to repress. It undergoes no alternation of passions ; it is not at one time flushed with hope, nor at another chilled by disappointment.

To a considerate and feeling mind there is something deeply afflicting in seeing the engaging cheerfulness and cloudless gayety incident to youth welcomed as a sufficient indication of internal purity by the delighted parents ; who, knowing the deceitfulness of these flattering appearances, should eagerly avail themselves of this period, when once wasted, never to be regained, of good-humoured acquiescence and dutiful docility—a period when the soft and ductile temper of the mind renders it more easily susceptible of the impressions we desire; and when, therefore, habits should be formed, which may assist our natural weakness to resist the temptations to which we shall be exposed in the commerce of maturer life. This is more especially affecting in the female sex, because that sex seems, by the very constitution of its nature, to be more favourably disposed than ours to the feelings and offices of religion; being thus fitted, by the bounty of Providence, the better to execute the important task which devolves on it, of the education of our earliest youth. Doubtless, this more favourable disposition to religion in the female sex, was graciously designed also to make women doubly valuable in the wedded state; and it seems to afford to the married man the means of rendering an active share in the business of life more compatible than it would otherwise be with the liveliest devotional feelings; that when the husband should return to his family, worn and harassed by worldly cares or professional labours, the wife, habitually preserving a warmer and more unimpaired spirit of devotion than is perhaps consistent with being immersed in the bustle of life, might revive his languid piety; and that the religious impressions of both might derive new force and tenderness from the animating sympathies of conjugal affection. Can a more pleasing image be presented to a considerate mind than that of a couple, happy in each other and in the pledges of their mutual love, uniting in an act of grateful adoration to the Author of all their mercies; recommending each other, and the objects of their common care, to the divine protection; and repressing the solicitude of conjugal and parental tenderness by a confiding hope that, through all the changes of this uncertain life, the Disposer of all things will assuredly cause all to work together for the good of them that love and put their trust in him; and that, after this uncertain state shall have passed away, they shall be admitted to a joint participation of never-ending happiness? It is surely no mean or ignoble office which we would allot to the female sex, when we would thus commit to them the charge of maintaining, in lively exercise, whatever emotions most dignify and adorn human nature; when we would make them as it were the medium of our intercourse with the heavenly world, the faithful repositories of the religious principle, for the benefit both of the present and of the rising generation. Must it not then excite our grief and indignation when we behold mothers, forgetful at once of their own peculiar duties and of the high office which Providence designed their daughters to fulfill, exciting instead of moderating in them the natural sanguineness and inconsiderateness of youth; hurrying them night after night to the resorts of dissipation; thus teaching them to despise the common comforts of the family circle; and, instead of striving to raise their views, and to direct their affections to their true object, acting as if with the express design studiously to extinguish every spark of a devotional spirit, and to kindle in its stead an excessive love of pleasure, and, perhaps, a principle of extravagant vanity, and ardent emulation?

Innocent young women! Good-hearted young men! Wherein does this goodness of heart and this innocence appear? Remember that we are fallen creatures, born in sin, and naturally depraved. Christianity recognizes no innocence or goodness of heart but in the remission of sin, and in the effects of the operation of divine grace. Do we find, in these young persons, the characters which the Holy Scriptures lay down as the only satisfactory evidences of a safe state? Do we not, on the other hand, discover the specific marks of a state of alienation from God? Can the blindest partiality persuade itself, that they are loving or striving “to love God with all their hearts and minds and souls and strength?” Are they “seeking first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness?” Are they “working out their salvation with fear and trembling?” Are they “clothed with humility?” Are they not, on the contrary, supremely given up to self-indulgence? Are they not at least “lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God?” Are the offices of religion their solace, or their task? Do they not come to these sacred services with reluctance, continue in them by restraint, and quit them with gladness? And to how many of these persons may not the prophet’s language be applied: “The harp and the viol, the tabret and pipe, and wine, are in their feasts; but they regard not the work of the Lord, neither consider the operation of his hands?” Are not the youth of one sex often actually committing, and still more often wishing for the opportunity to commit, those sins of which the Scripture says expressly, “that they who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God?" Are not the youth of the other sex principally intent on the gratification of vanity; and looking for their chief happiness to the resorts of gayety and fashion, and to all the multiplied pleasures which public places, or the still higher gratifications of more refined circles, can supply?

And then, when the first ebullitions of youthful warmth are over, what is their boasted reformation? They may be decent, sober, useful, respectable, as members of the community, or amiable in the relations of domestic life. But is this the change of which the Scripture speaks? Hear the expressions which it uses, and judge for yourselves:—"Except a man be born again, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."—"the old man is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts;" an expression but too descriptive of the vain delirium of youthful dissipation, and of the false dreams of pleasure which it inspires; but "the new man" is awakened from this fallacious estimate of happiness; "he is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him."—"He is created after God in righteousness and true holiness." The persons of whom we are speaking are no longer indeed so thoughtless and wild and dissipated as formerly; so negligent in their attention to objects of real value; so eager in the pursuit of pleasure; so prone to yield to the impulse of appetite. But this is no more than the change of which a writer of no very strict cast speaks, as naturally belonging to their riper age:

Conversis studiis, ætas, animusque virilis
 Quærit opes, et amicitias: inservit honori:
 Commisisse cavet, quod mox mutare laboret. HOR.

This is a point of infinite importance: let it not be thought tedious to spend even yet a few more moments in the discussion of it. Put the question to another issue, and try it upon this principle, that life is a state of probation; (a principle true indeed in a certain sense, though not exactly in that which is sometimes assigned to it;) and you will still be led to no very different conclusion. Probation implies resisting, in obedience to the dictates of religion, appetites which we are naturally prompted to gratify. Young people are not tempted to be churlish, interested, covetous; but to be inconsiderate and dissipated, “lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God.” People, again, in middle age are not so strongly tempted to be thoughtless and idle and licentious. From excesses of this sort they are sufficiently withheld, particularly when happily settled in domestic life, by a regard to their characters, by the restraints of family connections, and by a sense of what is due to the decencies of the married state. Their probation is of another sort; they are tempted to be supremely engrossed by worldly cares, by family interests, by professional objects, by the pursuit of wealth or of ambition. Thus occupied, they are tempted to “mind earthly rather than heavenly things;” to forget “the one thing needful;” to “set their affections” on temporal rather than on eternal concerns; and to take up with “a form of godliness,” instead of seeking to experience the power thereof; the foundations of this nominal religion being laid in the forgetfulness, if not in the ignorance, of the peculiar doctrines of Christianity. These are the ready-made Christians formerly spoken of, who consider Christianity as a geographical term, properly applicable to all those who have been born and educated in a country wherein Christianity is professed; not as indicating a renewed nature, or as expressive of a peculiar character, with its appropriate desires and aversions, and hopes and fears, and joys and sorrows. To people of this description, the solemn admonition of Christ is addressed: "I know thy works; that thou hast a name, that thou livest, and art dead. Be watchful, and strengthen the things which remain, that are ready to die; for I have not found thy works perfect before God."

If there be any one who is inclined to listen to this solemn warning, who is awakened from his dream of false security, and is disposed to be not only almost but altogether a Christian—O! let him not stifle or dissipate these beginnings of seriousness, but sedulously cherish them as the "workings of the divine Spirit," which would draw him from the "broad" and crowded "road of destruction, into the narrow" and thinly-peopled "path that leadeth to life." Let him retire from the multitude. Let him enter into his closet, and on his bended knees implore, for Christ's sake, and in reliance on his mediation, that God would "take away from him the heart of stone, and give him a heart of flesh;" that the Father of light would open his eyes to his true condition, and clear his heart from the clouds of prejudice, and dissipate the deceitful medium of self-love. Then let him carefully examine his past life, and his present course of conduct; comparing himself with God's word, and considering how any one might reasonably have been expected to conduct himself, to whom the Holy Scriptures had been always open, and who had been used to acknowledge them to be the revelation of the will of his Creator and Governor and Supreme Benefactor; let him there peruse the awful denunciations against impenitent sinners; let him labour to become more and more deeply impressed with a sense of his own radical blindness and corruption: above all, let him steadily contemplate, in all its relations, that stupendous truth, the incarnation and crucifixion of the only-begotten Son of God, and the message of mercy proclaimed from the cross to repenting sinners—"Be ye reconciled unto God"—"Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

When he fairly estimates the guilt of sin by the costly satisfaction which was required to atone for it, and the worth of his soul by the price which was paid for its redemption, and contrasts both of these with his own sottish inconsiderateness; when he reflects on the amazing love and pity of Christ, and on the cold and formal acknowledgments with which he has hitherto returned this infinite obligation, making light of the precious blood of the Son of God, and trifling with the gracious invitations of his Redeemer—surely, if he be not lost to sensibility, there will rise within him mixed emotions of guilt and fear and shame and remorse and sorrow, which will nearly overwhelm his soul; and he will smite upon his breast, and cry out in the language of the publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner." But, blessed be God, such a one needs not despair—it is to persons in this very situation, and with these very feelings, that the offers of the gospel are held forth, and its promises assured; “to the weary and heavy laden” under the burden of their sins; to them who thirst for the water of life; to them who feel themselves “tied and bound by the chain of their sins;” who abhor their captivity, and long earnestly for deliverance. Happy, happy souls! whom the grace of God has visited—“has brought out of darkness into his marvelous light,” and “from the power of Satan unto God.” Cast yourselves then on his undeserved mercy: he is full of love, and will not spurn you from his footstool: surrender yourselves into his hands; and solemnly resolve, through his grace, to dedicate henceforth all your faculties and powers to his service.

It is yours now “to work out your own salvation with fear and trembling,” relying on the fidelity of Him who has promised to “work in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure.” Ever look to Him for help: your only safety consists in a deep and permanent sense of your own weakness, and in a firm reliance on his strength. If you “give all diligence,” his power is armed for your protection, his truth is pledged for your security. You are enlisted under the banners of Christ—fear not, though the world and the flesh and the devil are set in array against you—“Faithful is he that hath promised;”—“be ye also faithful unto death, and he will give you a crown of life.”—“He that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved.” In such a world as this, in such a state of society as ours, especially if, in the higher walks of life, you must be prepared to meet with many difficulties:—arm yourselves, therefore, in the first place, with a determined resolution not to rate human estimation beyond its true value; not to dread the charge of particularity, when it shall be necessary to incur it; but let it be your constant endeavour to retain, before your mental eye, that bright assemblage of invisible spectators, who are the witnesses of your daily conduct, and “to seek that honour which cometh from God.” You cannot advance a single step till you are in some good measure possessed of this comparative indifference to the favour of men. We have before explained ourselves too clearly to render it necessary to declare, that no one should needlessly affect singularity; but to aim at objects that are incompatible with each other, or, in other words, to seek to please God and the world, where their commands are really at variance, is the way to be neither respectable nor good nor happy. Continue to be ever aware of your own radical corruption and habitual weakness. Indeed, if your eyes be really opened, and your heart truly softened—if you “hunger and thirst after righteousness,” rising in your ideas of true holiness, and proving the genuineness of your hope by desiring “to purify yourself even as God is pure,”—you will become daily more and more sensible of your own defects and wants and weaknesses; and more and more impressed by a sense of the mercy and long-suffering of that gracious Saviour “who forgiveth all your sins and healeth all your infirmities.”

This is the solution of what, to a man of the world, might seem a strange paradox—that, in proportion as the Christian grows in grace, he grows also in humility. Humility is indeed the vital principle of Christianity; that principle by which, from first to last, she lives and thrives; and in proportion to the growth or decline of which she must decay or flourish. This first disposes the sinner, in deep self-abasement, to accept the offers of the gospel; this, during his whole progress, is the very ground and basis of his feelings and conduct, in relation to God, his fellow-creatures, and himself; and, when at length he shall be translated into the realms of glory, this principle shall still subsist in undiminished force: he shall “fall down, and cast his crown before the Lamb; and ascribe blessing and honour and glory and power to Him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever.” The practical benefits of this habitual lowliness of spirit are too numerous, and at the same time too obvious, to require enumeration. It will lead you to dread the beginnings, and fly from the occasions of sin—as that man would shun some infectious distemper who should know that he was predisposed to take the contagion. It will prevent a thousand difficulties, and decide a thousand questions concerning worldly compliances—by which those persons are apt to be embarrassed who are not duly sensible of their own exceeding frailty, whose views of the Christian character are not sufficiently elevated, and who are not enough possessed with a continual fear of “grieving the Holy Spirit of God,” and of thus provoking him to withdraw his gracious influence. But if you are really such as we have been describing, you need not be urged to set the standard of practice high, and to strive after universal holiness. It is the desire of your hearts to act in all things with a single eye to the favour of God; and thus the most ordinary actions of life will be raised into offices of religion. This is the purifying, the transmuting principle, which realizes the fabled touch which changes all to gold. But to this desire of pleasing God, it is essential that we should be continually solicitous to discover the path of duty; that we should not indolently wait for such occasions of glorifying God as are forced upon us, but pray earnestly to God for a spirit of wisdom and understanding, that we may be acute in discerning opportunities of serving him, judicious in selecting, and wise in improving them. It is essential also that you guard against the distraction of worldly cares; and cultivate heavenly-mindedness, and a spirit of continual prayer; and that you watch incessantly over the workings of your own deceitful heart. To this I must add, that you must be active also, and useful. Let not your precious time be wasted "in shapeless idleness"—an admonition which, in our days, is rendered but too necessary by the relaxed habits of persons even of real piety; but wisely husband and improve this fleeting treasure. Never be satisfied with your present attainments; but, "forgetting the things which are behind," labour still to "press forward," with undiminished energy, and to run the race that is set before you without weariness or intermission.

Above all, measure your progress by your improvement in love to God and man. "God is love." This is the sacred principle which warms and enlightens the heavenly world, that blessed seat of God's visible presence. There it shines with unclouded radiance. Some scattered beams of it are graciously transmitted to us on earth, or we had been benighted and lost in darkness and misery; but a larger portion of it is infused into the hearts of the servants of God, who thus "are renewed in the divine likeness," and even here exhibit some faint traces of the image of their heavenly Father. It is the principle of love which disposes them to yield themselves up without reserve to the service of Him "who bought them with the price of his own blood."

Servile and base and mercenary is the notion of Christian practice among the bulk of nominal Christians. They give no more than they dare not withhold; they abstain from nothing but what they must not practise. When you state to them the doubtful quality of any action, and the consequent obligation to desist from it, they reply to you in the very spirit of Shylock, "they cannot find it in the bond." In short, they know Christianity only as a system of restraints. She is despoiled of every liberal and generous principle; she is rendered almost unfit for the social intercourses of life, and is only suited to the gloomy walls of a cloister, in which they would confine her. But true Christians consider themselves not as satisfying some rigorous creditor, but as discharging a debt of gratitude. Theirs, accordingly, is not the stinted return of a constrained obedience, but the large and liberal measure of a voluntary service. This principle, therefore, prevents a thousand practical embarrassments by which they are continually harassed who act from a less generous motive; and who require it to be clearly ascertained to them, that any gratification or worldly compliance which may be in question is beyond the allowed boundary line of Christian practice.* This principle regulates the true Christian's choice of companions and friends, where he is at liberty to make an option; this fills him with the desire of promoting the temporal welfare of all around him, and still more with pity and love, and anxious solicitude for their spiritual happiness. Indifference indeed in this respect is one of the surest signs of a low or declining state in religion. This animating principle it is, which, in the true Christian's happier hour, inspirits his devotions, and causes him to delight in the worship of God: which fills him with consolation and peace and gladness, and sometimes even enables him "to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."

* "Neither will I offer burnt-offerings unto the Lord my God"

But this world is not his resting-place: here, to the very last, he must be a pilgrim and a stranger: a soldier whose warfare ends only with life, ever struggling and combating with the powers of darkness, and with the temptations of the world around him, and the still more dangerous hostilities of internal depravity. The perpetual vicissitudes of this uncertain state, the peculiar trials and difficulties with which the life of a Christian is checkered, and still more, the painful and humiliating remembrance of (says David) "of that which doth cost me nothing," 2 Sam. xxiv, 24. "They" (the apostles) "departed from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for the name of Jesus." Acts v, 41. See also 1 Thess. i, 6. Heb. x, 34. James i, 2. 1 Peter iv, 13, 14.

Such are the marks exhibited in Scripture of a true love to God; and though our regard for our common Lord is not put to the same severe test, as that of the apostles and first Christians was; yet, if the same principle existed in us also, it would surely dispose us to act in the spirit of that conduct; and prompt us rather to be willing to exceed in self-denials and labours for Christ's sake, than to be so forward as we are to complain, whenever we are called upon to perform or to abstain from a yielding, though in an instance ever so little contrary to our inclinations.

his own infirmities, teach him to look forward, almost with outstretched neck, to that promised day when he shall be completely delivered from the bondage of corruption, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away. In the anticipation of that blessed period, and comparing this churlish and turbulent world, (where competition and envy and anger and revenge so vex and agitate the sons of men,) with that blissful region where love shall reign without disturbance, and where all, knit together in bonds of indissoluble friendship, shall unite in one harmonious song of praise to the Author of their common happiness—the true Christian triumphs over the fear of death; he longs to realize these cheering images, and to obtain admission into that blessed company. With far more justice than it was originally used, he may adopt the beautiful exclamation—“O præclarum illum diem, cum ad illud divinum animorum concilium cœtumque proficiscar, atque ex hac turba et colluvione discedam!”

What has been now remarked concerning the habitual feelings of the real believer may suggest a reply to an objection common in the mouths of nominal Christians, that we would deny men the innocent amusements and gratifications of life; thus causing our religion to wear a gloomy forbidding aspect, instead of her true and natural face of cheerfulness and joy. This is a charge of so serious a nature that although it lead into a digression, it may not be improper to take some notice of it.

In the first place, Religion prohibits no amusement or gratification which is really innocent. The question, however, of its innocence must not be tried by the loose maxims of worldly morality, but by the spirit of the injunctions of the word of God, and by the indulgence being conformable or not conformable to the genius of Christianity, and to the tempers and dispositions of mind enjoined on its professors. There can be no dispute concerning the true end of recreations. They are intended to refresh our exhausted bodily or mental powers, and to restore us, with renewed vigour, to the more serious occupations of life. Whatever, therefore, fatigues either body or mind, instead of refreshing them, is not fitted to answer the designed purpose. Whatever consumes more time or money or thought than it is expedient (I might say necessary) to allot to mere amusement can hardly be approved by any one who considers these talents as precious deposits, for the expenditure of which he will have to give account. Whatever directly or indirectly must be likely to injure the welfare of a fellow-creature can scarcely be a suitable recreation for a Christian, who is "to love his neighbour as himself," or a very consistent diversion for any one the business of whose life is to diffuse happiness.

But does a Christian never relax? Let us not so wrong and vilify the bounty of Providence, as to allow for a moment, that the sources of innocent amusement are so rare that men must be driven, almost by constraint, to such as are of a doubtful quality. On the contrary, such has been the Creator's goodness, that almost every one of our physical and intellectual and moral faculties (and the same may be said of the whole creation which we see around us,) is not only calculated to answer the proper end of its being, by its subserviency to some purpose of solid usefulness, but to be the instrument of administering pleasure.

“Not content

With every food of life to nourish man, Thou mak'st all nature beauty to his eye
And music to his ear.”

Our Maker also, in his kindness, has so constructed us, that even mere vicissitude is grateful and refreshing; a consideration which should prompt us often to seek, from a prudent variation of useful pursuits, that recreation for which we are apt to resort to what is altogether unproductive and unfruitful.

Yet rich and multiplied are the springs of innocent relaxation. The Christian relaxes in the temperate use of all the gifts of Providence. Imagination, and taste, and genius, and the beauties of creation, and the works of art, lie open to him. He relaxes in the feast of reason, in the intercourses of society, in the sweets of friendship, in the endearments of love, in the exercise of hope, of confidence, of joy, of gratitude, of universal goodwill, of all the benevolent and generous affections; which, by the gracious appointment of our Creator, while they disinterestedly intend only happiness to others, are most surely productive of peace and joy to ourselves. O! little do they know of the true measure of man's enjoyment, who can compare these delightful complacencies with the frivolous pleasures of dissipation, or the coarse gratifications of sensuality. It is no wonder, however, that the nominal Christian should reluctantly give up, one by one, the pleasures of the world; and look back upon them, when relinquished, with eyes of wistfulness and regret; because he knows not the sweetness of the delights with which true Christianity repays those trifling sacrifices; and is wholly unacquainted with the nature of that pleasantness which is to be found in the ways of religion.

It is indeed true, that when any one, who has long been going on in the gross and unrestrained practice of vice, is checked in his career, and enters at first on a religious course, he has much to undergo. Fear, guilt, remorse, shame, and various other passions, struggle and conflict within him. His appetites are clamorous for their accustomed gratification; and inveterate habits are scarcely to be denied. He is weighed down by a load of guilt, and almost overwhelmed by the sense of his unworthiness. But all this ought in fairness to be charged to the account of his past sins, and not to that of his present repentance. It rarely happens, however, that this state of suffering continues very long. When the mental gloom is the blackest, a ray of heavenly light occasionally breaks in, and suggests the hope of better days. Even in this life it is found a universal truth, that "they that sow in tears," provided they be really tears of penitence and contrition, "shall reap in joy." "The broken and contrite heart God never did nor ever will despise."

Neither, when we maintain, that the ways of religion are ways of pleasantness, do we mean to deny that the Christian's internal state is, through the whole of his life, a state of discipline and warfare. Several of the causes which contribute to render it such have been already pointed out, together with the workings of his mind in relation to them; but if he has solitudes and griefs peculiar to himself, he has “joys also with which a stranger intermeddles not.”

“Drink deep,” however, “or taste not,” is a direction fully as applicable to religion, if we would find it a source of pleasure, as it is to knowledge. A little religion is, it must be confessed, apt to make men gloomy, as a little knowledge is to render them vain: hence the unjust imputation often brought upon religion by those whose degree of religion is just sufficient, by condemning their course of conduct, to render them uneasy; enough merely to impair the sweetness of the pleasures of sin, and not enough to compensate for the relinquishment of them by its own peculiar comforts. Thus these men bring up, as it were, an ill report of that land of promise which in truth abounds with whatever in our journey through life can best refresh and strengthen us.

We have enumerated some sources of pleasure which men of the world may understand, and must acknowledge to belong to the true Christian; but there are others, and these of a still higher class, to which they must confess themselves strangers. To say nothing of a qualified, I dare not say an entire, exemption from these distracting passions and corroding cares by which they must naturally be harassed whose treasure is within the reach of mortal accidents—the Christian has an humble quiet-giving hope of being reconciled to God, and of enjoying his favour; he has a solid peace of mind, (which the world can neither give nor take away,) resulting from a firm confidence in the infinite wisdom and goodness of God, and in the unceasing care and kindness of a gracious Saviour; and he has persuasion of the truth of the divine assurance, that all things shall work together for his good.

When the pulse indeed beats high, and we are flushed with youth and health and vigour—when all goes on prosperously, and success seems almost to anticipate our wishes—then we feel not the want of the consolations of religion; but when fortune frowns or friends forsake us—when sorrow or sickness or old age comes upon us—then it is, that the superiority of the pleasures of religion is established over those of dissipation and vanity, which are ever apt to fly from us when we are most in want of their aid. There is scarcely a more melancholy sight to a considerate mind than that of an old man who is a stranger to those only true sources of satisfaction. How affecting, and at the same time how disgusting, is it to see such a one awkwardly catching at the pleasures of his younger years, which are now beyond his reach; or feebly attempting to retain them, while they mock his endeavours, and elude his grasp! To such a one, gloomily indeed does the evening of life set in. All is sour and cheerless. He can neither look backward with complacency nor forward with hope; while the aged Christian, relying on the assured mercy of his Redeemer, can calmly reflect, that his dismissal is at hand, and that his redemption draweth nigh; while his strength declines, and his faculties decay, he can quietly repose himself on the fidelity of God; and at the very entrance of the valley of the shadow of death, he can lift up an eye, dim, perhaps, and feeble, yet occasionally sparkling with hope, and confidently looking forward to the near possession of his heavenly inheritance, even “to those joys which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive."

Never were there times which inculcated more forcibly than those in which we live the wisdom of seeking a happiness beyond the reach of human vicissitudes. What striking lessons have we had of the precarious tenure of all sublunary possessions! Wealth and power and prosperity, how peculiarly transitory and uncertain! But religion dispenses her choicest cordials in the seasons of exigence, in poverty, in exile, in sickness, and in death. The essential superiority of that support which is derived from religion is less felt, at least it is less apparent, when the Christian is in full possession of riches and splendour and rank, and all the gifts of nature and fortune. But when all these are swept away by the rude hand of time, or the rough blast of adversity, the true Christian stands, like the glory of the forest, erect and vigorous; stripped indeed of his summer foliage, but more than ever discovering to the observing eye the solid strength of his substantial texture:

Pondere fixa suo est, nudosque per aëra ramos
Attollens, trunco non frondibus efficit umbram.

SECT. II.

Advice to some who profess their full Assent to the fundamental Doctrines of the Gospel.

In a former chapter, we largely insisted on what may be termed the fundamental practical error of the bulk of professed Christians in our days, their either overlooking or misconceiving the peculiar method which the gospel has provided for the renovation of our corrupted nature, and for the attainment of every Christian grace.

But there are mistakes on the right hand and on the left; and our general proneness, when we are flying from one extreme to run into an opposite error, renders it necessary to superadd another admonition. The generally prevailing error of the present day, indeed, is that fundamental one which has been already pointed out. But while we attend, in the first place, to that, and, on the warrant both of Scripture and experience, prescribe hearty repentance and lively faith as the only foundation of all true holiness, we must at the same time guard against a practical mistake of another kind. They who, with penitent hearts, have humbled themselves before the cross of Christ, and who, pleading his merits as their only ground of pardon and acceptance with God, have resolved henceforth, through the help of his Spirit, to bring forth the fruits of righteousness, are sometimes apt to conduct themselves as if they considered their work as now done, or, at least, as if this were the whole they had to do, as often as, by falling afresh into sin, another act of repentance and faith may seem to have become necessary. There are not a few, in our relaxed age, who thus satisfy themselves with what may be termed general Christianity; who feel general penitence and humiliation from a sense of their sinfulness in general, and general desires of universal holiness, but who neglect that vigilant and jealous care with which they should labour to extirpate every particuar corruption, by studying its nature, its root, its ramifications, and thus becoming acquainted with its secret movements, with the means whereby it gains strength, and with the most effectual methods of resisting it. In like manner, they are far from striving, with persevering alacrity, for the acquisition and improvement of every Christian grace. Nor is it unusual for ministers, who preach the truths of the gospel with fidelity, ability, and success, to be themselves also liable to the charge of dwelling altogether in their instructions on this general religion; instead of tracing and laying open all the secret motions of inward corruption, and instructing their hearers how best to conduct themselves in every distinct part of the Christian warfare; how best to strive against each particular vice, and to cultivate each grace of the Christian character. Hence it is, that in too many persons, concerning the sincerity of whose general professions of religion we should be sorry to entertain a doubt, we yet see little progress made in the regulation of their tempers, in the improvement of their time, in the reform of their plan of life, or in ability to resist the temptation to which they are particularly exposed. They will confess themselves, in general terms, to be "miserable sinners:" this is a tenet of their creed, and they feel even proud in avowing it. They will occasionally also lament particular failings; but this confession is sometimes obviously made in order to draw forth a compliment for the very opposite virtue; and where this is not the case, it is often not difficult to detect, under this false guise of contrition, a secret self-complacency, arising from the manifestations which they have afforded of their acuteness or candour in discovering the infirmity in question, or of their frankness or humility in acknowledging it. This will scarcely seem an illiberal suspicion to any one who either watches the workings of his own heart, or who observes that the faults confessed in these instances are very seldom those with which the person is most clearly and strongly chargeable.

We must plainly warn these men, and the consideration is seriously pressed on their instructors also, that they are in danger of deceiving themselves. Let them beware lest they be nominal Christians of another sort. These persons require to be reminded, that there is no short compendious method of holiness; but that it must be the business of their whole lives to grow in grace, and, continually adding one virtue to another, as far as possible, "to go on towards perfection." "He only that doeth righteousness is righteous." Unless "they bring forth the fruits of the Spirit" they can have no sufficient evidence that they have received that "Spirit of Christ" "without which they are none of his." But where, on the whole, our unwillingness to pass an unfavourable judgment may lead us to indulge a hope, that "the root of the matter is found in them,"—yet we must at least declare to them, that, instead of adorning the doctrine of Christ, they disparage and discredit it. The world sees not their secret humiliation, nor the exercises of their closets; but it is acute in discerning practical weaknesses; and if it observe that they have the same eagerness in the pursuit of wealth or ambition, the same vain taste for ostentation and display, the same ungoverned tempers, which are found in the generality of mankind—it will treat with contempt their pretences to superior sanctity and indifference to worldly things, and will be hardened in its prejudices against the only mode which God has provided for our escaping the wrath to come, and obtaining eternal happiness.

Let him, then, who would be indeed a Christian, watch over his ways and over his heart with unceasing circumspection. Let him endeavour to learn, both from men and books, particularly from the lives of eminent Christians,* what methods have been actually found most effectual for the conquest of every particular vice, and for improvement in every branch of holiness. Thus, whilst he studies his own character, and observes the most secret workings of his own mind, and of our common nature, the knowledge which he will acquire of the human heart in general, and especially of his own, will be of the highest utility in enabling him to avoid or to guard against the occasions of evil; and it will also tend, above all things, to the growth of humility, and to the maintenance of that sobriety of spirit and tenderness of

* It may not be amiss to mention a few useful publications of this sort. Walton's Lives, particularly the last edition by Mr. Zouch; Gilpin's Lives; the Lives of Bishop Bedel and Bishop Bull; of Archbishop Usher; Fell's life of Hammond; Archdeacon Hamilton's Life of Mr. Bonnel, Accomptant General of Ireland, recommended by the Archbishop of Dublin, the Bishops of Meath, Derry, Limerick, Clogher, and Down; some extracts from Burnet of the Life of the incomparable Leighton, prefixed to a volume of the latter's Sermons; Passages of the Life of Lord Rochester, by Burnet; the Life of Sir Matthew Hale; of the excellent Doddridge, by Orton; of Henry, father and son; of Mather; of Halyburton; Hanson's and Whitehead's Life of Wesley; Life of Baxter, by himself; the Life of the Rev. Thomas Scott, lately published by his son; the Lives of the Rev. David Brown of Calcutta; of the Rev. Dr. Buchanan and Henry Martyn; of Col. Gardiner; of Gov. Melville, &c. conscience which are eminently characteristic of the true Christian. It is by this unceasing diligence, as the apostle declares, that the servants of Christ must make their calling sure; and it is by this only that their labour will ultimately succeed; for “so an entrance shall be administered unto them abundantly, into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.”

SECT. III.

Brief Observations addressed to Sceptics and Unitarians.

There is another class of men—an increasing class, it is to be feared—in this country, that of absolute unbelievers, with which this little work has properly no concern; but may the writer, sincerely pitying their melancholy state, be permitted to ask them one plain question? If Christianity be not in their estimation true, yet is there not at least a presumption in its favour, sufficient to entitle it to a serious examination, from its having been embraced (and that not blindly and implicitly, but upon full inquiry and deep consideration) by Bacon and Milton and Locke and Newton, and much the greater part of those who, by the reach of their understandings, or the extent of their knowledge, and by the freedom too of their minds, and their daring to combat existing prejudices, have called forth the respect and admiration of mankind? It might be deemed scarcely fair to insist on churchmen, though some of them are among the greatest names this country has ever known. Can the sceptic in general say with truth, that he has either prosecuted an examination into the evidences of revelation at all, or at least with a seriousness and diligence in any degree proportioned to the importance of the subject? The fact is, and it is a fact which redounds to the honour of Christianity, that infidelity is not the result of sober inquiry and deliberate preference. It is rather the slow production of a careless and irreligious life, operating together with prejudices and erroneous conceptions concerning the nature of the leading doctrines and fundamental tenets of Christianity.

Take the case of young men of condition, bred up by what we have termed nominal Christians. When children, they are carried to church, and thence they become acquainted with such parts of Scripture as are contained in our public service. If their parents preserve still more of the customs of better times, they are taught their catechism, and furnished with a little further religious knowledge. After a while, they go from under the eyes of their parents; they enter into the world, and move forward in the path of life, whatever it be, which has been assigned to them. They yield to the temptations which assail them, and become more or less dissipated and licentious. At least they neglect to look into their Bible; they do not enlarge the sphere of their religious acquisitions; they do not even endeavour, by reflection and study, to mature their knowledge, or to turn into rational conviction the opinions which in their childhood they had taken upon trust.

They travel perhaps into foreign countries; a proceeding which naturally tends to weaken their nursery prejudice in favour of the religion in which they were bred, and, by removing them from all means of public worship, to relax their practical habits of religion. They return home, and commonly are either hurried round in the vortex of dissipation, or engage with the ardour of youthful minds in some public or professional pursuit. If they read or hear anything about Christianity, it is commonly only about those tenets which are subjects of controversy; and what reaches their ears from their occasional attendance at church, though it may sometimes impress them with an idea of the purity of Christian morality, contains much which, coming thus detached, perplexes and offends them, and suggests various doubts and startling objections, which a further acquaintance with the Scripture would remove. Thus knowing Christianity chiefly by the difficulties it contains, and sometimes tempted by the ambition of showing themselves superior to vulgar prejudice, or prompted by the natural pride of the human heart to cast off their subjection to dogmas imposed on them—disgusted too, perhaps, by the immoral lives of some professed Christians, by the weaknesses and absurdities of others, and by what they observe to be the implicit belief of numbers whom they see and know to be equally ignorant with themselves—they are filled with doubts and suspicions, which, to a greater or less extent, spring up within them. These doubts enter into the mind at first almost imperceptibly: they exist only as vague indistinct surmises, and by no means take the precise shape or substance of a formed opinion. At first, probably, they even offend and startle by their intrusion; but by degrees the unpleasant sensations which they once excited wear off, and the mind grows more familiar with them. A confused sense (for such it is, rather than a formed idea) of its being desirable that their doubts should prove well founded, and of the comfort and enlargement which would be afforded by that proof, lends them much secret aid. The impression becomes deeper; not in consequence of being reinforced by fresh arguments, but merely by dint of having longer rested in the mind; and as they increase in force, they creep on and extend themselves. At length they diffuse themselves over the whole of religion, and possess the mind in undisturbed occupancy.

It is by no means meant that this is universally the process. But, speaking generally, this might be termed, perhaps not unjustly, the natural history of scepticism. It approves itself to the experience of those who have with any care watched the progress of infidelity in persons around them; and it is confirmed by the written lives of some of the most eminent unbelievers. It is curious to read their own accounts of themselves, the rather as they accord so exactly with the result of our own observation.—We find that they once perhaps gave a sort of implicit hereditary assent to the truth of Christianity, and were what, by a mischievous perversion of language, the world denominates believers. How were they then awakened from their sleep of ignorance? At what moment did the light of truth beam in upon them, and dissipate the darkness in which they had been involved? The period of their infidelity is marked by no such determinate boundary. Reason and thought and inquiry had little or nothing to do with it. Having for many years lived careless and irreligious lives, and associated with companions equally careless and irreligious—not by force of study and reflection, but rather by the lapse of time, they at length attained to their infidel maturity. It is worthy of remark, that where any are reclaimed from infidelity, it is generally by a process much more rational than that which has been here described. Something awakens them to reflection. They examine, they consider, and at length yield their assent to Christianity on what they deem sufficient grounds.

From the account here given, it appears plainly that infidelity is generally the offspring of prejudice, and that its success is chiefly to be ascribed to the depravity of the moral character. This fact is confirmed by the undeniable truth, that in societies, which consist of individuals, infidelity is the natural fruit, not so much of a studious and disputatious as of a dissipated and vicious age. It diffuses itself in proportion as the general morals decline; and it is embraced with less apprehension when every infidel is kept in spirits, by seeing many around him who are sharing fortunes with himself.

To any fair mind this consideration alone might be offered, as suggesting a strong argument against infidelity, and in favour of revelation. And the friends of Christianity might justly retort the charge, which their opponents often urge with no little affectation of superior wisdom—that we implicitly surrender ourselves to the influence of prejudice, instead of examining dispassionately the ground of our faith, and yielding our assent only according to the degree of evidence.

In our own days, when it is but too clear that infidelity increases, it is not in consequence of the reasonings of the infidel writers having been much studied, but from the progress of luxury, and the decay of morals; and, so far as this increase may be traced at all to the works of sceptical writers, it has been produced, not by argument and discussion, but by sarcasms and points of wit, which have operated on weak minds, or on nominal Christians, by bringing gradually into contempt opinions which, in their case, had only rested on the basis of blind respect and the prejudices of education. It may therefore be laid down as an axiom, that infidelity is in general a disease of the heart more than of the understanding. If revelation were assailed only by reason and argument, it would have little to fear. The literary opposers of Christianity, from Herbert to Hume, have been seldom read. They made some stir in their day: during their span of existence they were noisy and noxious; but, like the locusts of the east, which for a while obscure the air and destroy the verdure, they were soon swept away and forgotten. Their very names would be scarcely found, if Leland had not preserved them from oblivion.

The account which has been given of the secret but grand source of infidelity may perhaps justly be extended to those also who deny the fundamental doctrines of the gospel.

In the course which we lately traced from nominal orthodoxy to absolute infidelity, Unitarianism * is,

* The author is aware, that he may perhaps be censured for conceding this term to the class of persons now in question, since orthodox Christians equally contend for the unity of the Divine Nature: and it perhaps may hardly be a sufficient excuse, that, indeed, a sort of half-way house, if the expression may be pardoned; a stage on the journey, where sometimes a person indeed finally stops, but where, not unfrequently, he only pauses for a while, and then pursues his progress.

The Unitarian teachers by no means profess to absolve their followers from the unbending strictness of Christian morality. They prescribe the predominant love of God, and a habitual spirit of devotion; but it is an unquestionable fact, a fact which they themselves almost admit, that this class of religionists is not in general distinguished for superior purity of life; and still less for that spirituality of mind which the word of God prescribes to us, as one of the surest tests of our experiencing the vital power of Christianity. On the contrary, in point of fact, Unitarianism seems to be resorted to, not merely by those who are disgusted with the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, but by those also who are seeking a refuge from the strictness of her practical precepts; and who, more particularly, would escape from the obligation which she imposes on her adherents, rather to incur the dreaded charge of singularity, than fall in with the declining manners of a dissipated age.

Unitarianism, where it may be supposed to proceed from the understanding rather than from the heart, is not unfrequently produced by a confused idea of the difficulties, or, as they are termed, the impossibilities, which orthodox Christianity is supposed to involve. It is not our intention to enter it not being his object particularly to refute the errors of Unitarianism, he uses the term in its popular sense, rather than give needless offence. He thus guards, however, against any false construction being drawn from his use of it.

into the controversy;* but it may not be improper to make one remark, as a guard to persons in whose way the arguments of the Unitarians may be likely to fall; namely, that one great advantage possessed by Deists, and perhaps in a still greater degree by Unitarians, in their warfare with the Christian system, results from the very circumstance of their being the assailants. They urge what they state to be powerful arguments against the truth of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and then call upon men to abandon them as posts no longer tenable. But they who are disposed to yield to this assault should call to mind, that it has pleased God so to establish the constitution of all things, that perplexing difficulties and plausible objections may be adduced against the most established truths; such, for instance, as the being of a God, and many others both physical and moral. In all cases therefore it becomes us, not on a partial view to reject any proposition, because it is attended with difficulties; but to compare the difficulties which it involves, with those which attend the alternative proposition which must be embraced on its rejection. We should put to the proof the alternative proposition in its turn, and see whether it be not still less tenable than that which we are summoned to abandon. In short, we should examine circumspectly on all sides; and abide

* The author of this treatise has, since its completion, perused a work entitled, Calvinism and Socinianism compared, by A. Fuller, &c.; and, without reference to the peculiarities of Calvinism, he is happy to embrace this opportunity of confessing the high obligation which, in common with all the friends of true religion, he owes to the author of that highly valuable publication, for his masterly defence of the doctrines of Christianity, and his acute refutation of the opposite errors.

by that opinion which, on carefully balancing all considerations, appears fairly entitled to our preference. Experience, however, will have convinced the attentive observer of those around him, that it has been for want of adverting to this just and obvious principle, that the Unitarians in particular have gained most of their proselytes from the Church, so far as argument has contributed to their success. If the Unitarians, or even the Deists, were considered in their turn as masters of the field, and were in their turn attacked, both by arguments tending to disprove their system directly, and to disprove it indirectly, (by showing the high probability of the truth of Christianity, and of its leading and peculiar doctrines,) it is most likely that they would soon be found wholly unable to keep their ground. In short, reasoning fairly, there is no medium between absolute Pyrrhonism and true Christianity; and if we reject the latter on account of its difficulties, we shall be still more loudly called upon to reject every other system which has been offered to the acceptance of mankind. This consideration might perhaps with advantage be more attended to than it has been, by those who take upon them to vindicate the truth of our holy religion; as many who, from inconsideration, or any other cause, are disposed to give up the great fundamentals of Christianity, would be startled by the idea, that, on the same principle on which they did this, they must give up the hope of finding any rest for the sole of their foot on any ground of religion, and not stop short of unqualified Atheism.

Besides the class of those who professedly reject Revelation, there is another, and that also, it is to be feared, an increasing one, which may be called the class of half-unbelievers, who are to be found in various degrees of approximation to a state of absolute infidelity. The system (if it deserve the name) of these men is grossly irrational. Hearing many who assert, and many who deny, the truth of Christianity, and not reflecting seriously enough to consider that it must be either true or false, they take up a strange sort of middle opinion of its qualified truth. They conceive that there must be something in it, though by no means to the extent to which it is pushed by orthodox Christians. They grant the reality of future punishment, and even that they themselves, if grossly immoral, cannot altogether expect to escape it; yet "they trust it will not go so hard with them as the churchmen state:" and, though disbelieving almost every material doctrine which Christianity contains, they by no means conceive themselves to be enlisted under the banners of infidelity, or to have much cause for apprehension respecting the final issue of their doubts.

But let these men be reminded, that there is no middle way. If they can be prevailed on to look into their Bible, and do not make up their minds absolutely to reject its authority, they must admit, that there is no ground whatever for this vain hope, which they suffer themselves to indulge, of escaping but with a slight measure of punishment. Nor let them think their guilt inconsiderable. Is it not grossly criminal to trifle with the long-suffering of God, to despise alike his invitations and his threatenings, and the offer of his Spirit, and the precious blood of the Redeemer? Sure we are that this is the Scripture estimate of their conduct: "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" "It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah, in the day of judgment," than for them who voluntarily shut their eyes against that full light which the bounty of Heaven has poured out upon them. These half-unbelievers are even more reprehensible than downright sceptics, for remaining in this state of careless uncertainty, without endeavouring to ascertain the truth or falsehood of revelation. The probability which they admit, that it may be true, imposes on them an additional and an undeniable obligation to inquiry. But both to them and to decided sceptics it must be plainly declared, that they are in these days less excusable than ever for not looking into the grounds and proofs on which the truth of Christianity is established; for never before were these proofs so plainly, and at so easy a rate, offered to the consideration of mankind. Through the bounty of Providence, the widely-spreading poison of infidelity has in our days been opposed by more numerous and more powerful antidotes. One of these has been already pointed out: and it should be matter of further gratitude to every real Christian, that in the very place on which modern infidelity had displayed the standard of victory, a warrior in the service of religion, a man of the most acute discernment and profound research, has been raised up by Providence to quell their triumph.* He was soon taken from us; but, happily for him and for ourselves, not till he had announced, that, like the Magi of old, he had seen the star of Christ in the east, and had fallen down and worshipped him. Another should be mentioned with honour, who is pursuing the track which that great man had pointed out.* Henceforth let all objectors against Christianity, on the ground of its being disproved by the oriental records, be put to silence. The strength of their cause consisted in their ignorance, and in our own, of oriental learning. They availed themselves for a while of our being in a state of darkness; but the light of day has at length broken in upon us, and exposed to deserved contempt their superficial speculations.

* It is almost superfluous to state, that Sir William Jones is here meant, who, from the testimony borne to his extraordinary talents by Sir John Shore, (now Lord Teignmouth,) in his first address to the Asiatic Society of Calcutta, appears to have been a man of most extraordinary genius and astonishing erudition.

The infatuation of these unbelievers would be less striking, if they were able altogether to decline Christianity; and were at liberty to relinquish their pretensions to its rewards, on condition of being exempted from its punishments. But that is not the case; they must stand the risk of the encounter, and their eternal happiness or misery is suspended upon the issue.† What must be the emotions of these men, on first opening their eyes in the world of spirits, and being convinced, too late, of the awful reality of their impending ruin! May the mercy and the power of God awaken them from their desperate slumber, while life is yet spared, and there is yet space for repentance!

* Mr. Manrice.

† This argument is pressed with uncommon force in Pascal's Thoughts on Religion, a work highly valuable, though not in every part to be approved, abounding in particular with those deep views of religion which the name of its author prepares us to expect.

SECT. IV.

Advice suggested by the state of the times to true Christians.

To those who really deserve the appellation of true Christians, much has been said incidentally in the course of the present work. It has been maintained, (and the proposition will not be disputed by any sound or experienced politician,) that they are always most important members of the community. But we may boldly assert, that there never was a period, wherein, more justly than in the present, this could be affirmed of them; whether the situation of our own country, in all its circumstances, be considered, or the general state of society in Europe. Let them on their part seriously weigh the important stations which they fill, and the various duties which it now peculiarly enforces on them. If we consult the most intelligent accounts of foreign countries which have been recently published, and compare them with the reports of former travelers, we must be convinced, that religion and the standard of morals are everywhere declining—abroad even more rapidly than in our own country. But still, the progress of irreligion, and the decay of morals, at home, are such as to alarm every considerate mind, and to forebode the worst of consequences, unless some remedy can be applied to the growing evil. We can depend only upon true Christians for effecting, in any degree, this important service. Their system is that of our national church: in proportion therefore as their system prevails, or as it increases in respect and estimation from the manifest good conduct of its followers, in that very proportion the church is strengthened in the foundations on which alone it can be supported, the esteem and the attachment of its members and of the nation at large. Zeal is required in the cause of religion; and they only can feel it. The charge of singularity must be incurred; and they only will dare to encounter it. Uniformity of conduct, and perseverance in exertion, will be requisite; but among no others can we look for these qualities.

Let true Christians then, with becoming earnestness, strive in all things to recommend their profession, and to put to silence the vain scoffs of ignorant objectors—let them boldly assert the cause of Christ in an age when so many who bear the name of Christians are ashamed of Him: and let them consider as devolved on them the important duty of serving, it may be of saving, their country, not by busy interference in politics, (in which it cannot but be confessed there is much uncertainty,) but rather by that sure and radical benefit of restoring the influence of religion, and of raising the standard of morality.

Let them be active, useful, generous towards others; manifestly moderate and self-denying in themselves. Let them be ashamed of idleness, as they would be of the most acknowledged sin. When Providence blesses them with affluence, let them withdraw from the competition of vanity; and, without sordidness or absurdity, show by their modest demeanour, and by their retiring from display, that, without affecting singularity, they are not slaves to fashion; that they consider it as their duty to set an example of moderation and sobriety, and to reserve for nobler and more disinterested purposes that money which others selfishly waste in parade and dress and equipage. Let them evince, in short, a manifest moderation in all temporal things; as becomes those whose affections are set on higher objects than any which this world affords, and those who possess within their own bosoms a fund of satisfaction and comfort, which the world seeks in vanity and dissipation. Let them cultivate a catholic spirit of universal goodwill, and of amicable fellowship towards all those, of whatever sect or denomination, who, differing from them in non-essentials, agree with them in the grand fundamentals of religion. Let them countenance men of real piety wherever they are found; and encourage in others every attempt to repress the progress of vice, and to revive and diffuse the influence of religion and virtue. Let their earnest prayers be constantly offered, that such endeavours may be successful, and that the abused long-suffering of God may still continue to us the invaluable privilege of vital Christianity.

Let them pray continually for their country in this season of national difficulty. We bear upon us but too plainly the marks of a declining empire. Who can say but that the Governor of the universe, who declares himself to be a God who hears the prayers of his servants, may, in answer to their intercessions, for a while avert our ruin, and continue to us the fulness of those temporal blessings which in such abundant measure we have hitherto enjoyed?*

* See some exquisitely beautiful lines in the last Book of Cowper's Task, wherein the sentiment is introduced.

Men of the world, indeed, however they may admit the operation of natural causes, and may therefore confess the effects of religion and morality in promoting the well-being of the community—may yet, according to their humour, with a smile of complacent pity, or a sneer of supercilious contempt, read of the service which real Christians may render to their country, by conciliating the favour and calling down the blessing of Providence. It may appear in their eyes an instance of the same superstitious weakness as that which prompts the terrified inhabitant of Sicily to bring forth the image of his tutelar saint, in order to stop the destructive ravages of Ætna. We are however sure, if we believe the Scripture, that God will be disposed to favour the nation to which his servants belong; and that, in fact, such as they have often been, they will be the unknown and unhonoured instruments of drawing down on their country the blessings of safety and prosperity.

But it would be an instance in myself of that very false shame which I have condemned in others, if I were not boldly to avow my firm persuasion, that to the decline of Religion and Morality our national difficulties must, both directly and indirectly, be chiefly ascribed; and that my only solid hopes for the well-being of my country depend, not so much on her fleets and armies, not so much on the wisdom of her rulers, or the spirit of her people, as on the persuasion, that she still contains many who love and obey the gospel of Christ; that their intercessions may yet prevail; that, for the sake of these, Heaven may still look upon us with an eye of favour.

Let the prayers of the Christian reader be also offered up for the success of this feeble endeavour in the service of true religion. God can give effect to the weakest effort; and the writer will feel himself most highly honoured, if, by anything which he has written, a single fellow-creature should be awakened from a false security, or a single Christian, who deserves the name, be animated to more extensive usefulness. He may seem to have assumed to himself a task which he was ill qualified to execute. He fears he may be reproached with arrogance and presumption for taking upon him the office of a teacher. Yet, as he formerly suggested, it cannot be denied, that it belongs to his public situation to investigate the state of the national religion and morals; and that it is the part of a real patriot to endeavour to retard their decline, and promote their revival. But if the office in which he has been engaged were less intimately connected with the duties of his particular station, the candid and the liberal mind would not be indisposed to pardon him. Let him be allowed to offer in his excuse a desire, not only to discharge a duty to his country, but to acquit himself of what he deems a solemn and indispensable obligation to his acquaintance and friends. Let him allege the unaffected solicitude which he feels for the welfare of his fellow-creatures. Let him urge the fond wish he gladly would encourage, that while in so large a part of Europe a false philosophy has been preferred before the lessons of Revelation—while infidelity has lifted up her head without shame, and walked abroad boldly, and in the face of day—while the practical consequences are such as might be expected, and licentiousness and vice prevail without restraint,—here at least there might be a sanctuary, a land of religion and piety, where the blessings of Christianity might still be enjoyed; where the name of the Redeemer might still be honoured; where mankind might be able to see what is, in truth, the religion of Jesus, and what are its blessed effects; and whence, if the mercy of God should so ordain it, the means of religious instruction and consolation might be again extended to surrounding countries and to the world at large.

THE END.

INDEX.

- ABUSE* of things, unfairness of arguing from it against their use, 143.
- Acceptance* with God, commonly prevailing notions respecting it, 173—179.
- Scripture, and Church of England, doctrine respecting it, 179—181.
- practical consequences of, common notions respecting it, 179.
- true doctrine vindicated from objection, 183.
- Addison*, quoted, 253.
- Affections*, of their admission into religion, 147.
- their admission into religion reasonable, 147—152.
- true test and measure of them in religion, 152—155.
- in religion, not barely allowable, but highly necessary, 155—159.
- our Saviour the just object of them, 159, 160.
- objection, that they are impossible towards an invisible Being, discussed, 160—169.
- little excited by public misfortunes, and why, 165.
- towards our Saviour, special grounds for them, 167.
- divine aid promised for exciting them, 167, 168.
- our statements respecting them in religion, verified by facts, 170, 171.
- religious, St. Paul a striking instance of them, 151.
- Ambition*, votaries of, 215, 216.
- Amiable* tempers, discussion respecting, 269—290.
- substituted for religion, 269, 270.
- value of, estimated by the standard of mere reason, 272.
- false pretenders to them, 272.
- real nature of, when not grounded on religion, 273, 274.

Amiable tempers, precarious nature of, 273—275.

— value of, on Christian principles, 277, 278.

— life, Christian's most so, 282—284.

— Christians urged to this, 282—287.

— its just praise, 289.

— apt to deceive us, 290, 291.

Applause, desire of, universal, 237—241.

Babington, the reverend Matthew, 349.

Benevolence, true Christian, its exalted nature, 376.

Bacon, Lord, quoted, 319.

Calumny, considerations which reconcile the Christian to it, 258—262.

Charity, true, what, and its marks, 401, 402.

Christianity, vital, revival of, would invigorate church establishment, 384.

— vital, alone suited to lower orders, 384, 385.

— the common system, falsely so called, 395.

— the truest patriotism, 375—380.

— of the world, its base nature, 414.

— not a gloomy service, 416—422.

— relaxations compatible with, 417—419.

— its solid texture, 422.

— general, what so called, 423—425.

— true, requires incessant watchfulness and care, 426, 427.
state in which it finds us, 120—123.

— its present critical circumstances, 356—360.

— reduced to a system of ethics, proofs of this, 362, 365—368.

— causes which have tended to produce neglect of her peculiar doctrines, 359—362.

— peculiar doctrines of, taught by the oldest divines and highest dignitaries of the English Church, 363, 364.

— peculiar doctrines gradually fallen into neglect, 365, 366.

— sad symptoms of its low state among us, 368—370.

— objection, that our system of it is too strict, stated and answered 370—373.

— vital, its happy influence on temporal well-being of communities, 373, 374.

Christianity, not hostile to patriotism, 376, 377.

— from its essential nature, peculiarly adapted to well-being of communities, 380—382.

— vital, can alone produce these effects, 382.

— excellence of it, in some particulars not commonly noticed, 342—350.

— general state of, in England, 352.

— its tendency to promote the well-being of political communities, 353—378, 382, 383.

— has raised the general standard of practice, 355, 356.

— sickens in prosperity, and flourishes under persecution, 356, 357.

— peculiarities of, naturally slide into disuse, 359, 360.

Christians, true, duties especially incumbent on them in these times, 440—444.

— should pray for their country, 442.

— their prayers entreated for the success of this work, 443.

— ready made, who esteemed such, 409.

— real, how different from nominal, 306—308.

— life illustrated by figure of a traveler, 308—310.

Commons, House of, proves inordinate love of worldly glory, 249.

Consistency between Christianity's leading doctrines and practical precepts, 332—342.

— between Christianity's leading doctrines amongst each other, 343.

— between Christianity's practical precepts amongst each other 343—347.

Contact, necessary to produce any interest in our affections, 163—167, 171.

Corruption of human nature, common notions of it, 104—107.

— of human nature, Scripture account of it, 107, 116, 117.

— of human nature, arguments suggested in proof of it, 108—114.

— of heathen world, and striking instance of it, 108, 109.

— of savage life, 109—110.

— proof of it, furnished by the state of the Christian world, 110—114.

— by the experience of the true Christian, 114.

— human, its general effects when suffered to operate without restraint, 116, 117.

— human, firm grounds on which it rests, 124.

Corruption, human, practical uses of the doctrine of, 125, 325.

Cowper's Task recommended, note, 324, 325.

— quoted, 342.

Defective conceptions generally prevailing concerning importance of Christianity, 91—95.

— conceptions concerning human corruption, 104, 105.

— conceptions concerning the evil spirit, 118.

— conceptions concerning the doctrines which respect our Saviour and the Holy Spirit, 133—133.

— conceptions concerning the means of acceptance with God, 173—181.

— conceptions prevailing concerning practical Christianity, 190—195, 206—296.

— conceptions of guilt and evil of sin, 297—301.

— fear of God, 303, 304.

— sense of the difficulty of getting to heaven, 304—307.

— love of God, proofs of it in nominal Christians, 310—312.

— conceptions, general, concerning peculiar doctrines of Christianity, 322.

— conceptions of peculiarities of Christianity, practical mischiefs from them, 322—325.

Depths of the things of God, and our proneness to plunge into them, 130, 131.

Devotedness to God, duty of it, 196—200, 202—206, 209.

Dissipated and indolent, class of, 212—214.

Dissipation seems to have prevailed in the antediluvian world, 303, 304.

Doddridge's Sermons on Regeneration, referred to, note, 173.

Dueling, its guilt, &c., 249—251.

Error, innocence of, considered, 100—104.

Establishment, religious, in England, how circumstanced, 357, 358.

Estimation, desire of, universal, 237.

— common language concerning it, the effects of the love of it, and the nature of the passion, 238—241.

— commendations of it questioned, 241.

— essential defects of inordinate love of it, explained, 242—244.

— love of, Scripture lessons concerning, 242—246.

Estimation, value of, analogous to riches, 247.

— love of, common notions respecting it, 247—249.

— proofs of our statements respecting it from House of Commons, 248.

— proofs of our statements respecting it from dueling, 249—251.

— real nature of inordinate love of it, 252—254.

— true Christian's conduct respecting love of it, 254—261.

— true modes of guarding against excessive love of it, 261—264.

— advice to the true Christian respecting love of it, 264—269.

— love of, best moderated by humility and charity, 267.

— true Christian's temper respecting it, 268.

Evil spirit, the existence and agency not contrary to reason, 118—120.

External actions substituted for habits of mind, 225, 226.

Faith, Christian's life a life of, 227—229.

Families, two, the righteous and the wicked, 302—304.

Ferguson, the historian, 380.

Fuller's Calvinism and Socinianism compared, note, 432.

Fundamental practical distinction between systems of nominal and real Christians, 229, 230, 242, 243.

General tone of morals, Christianity has raised it, 194.

— established by consent in every country, 351—356.

Geneva, the effect of theatres, note, 313.

Gloomy service, false charge that we make Christianity such, 416.

Glory, true and false, what properly so called, 243.

— mistakes concerning it, 243, 244.

Good-hearted young men, term misapplied, 399.

— young men, the title disproved, 405.

Gratitude, true signs of, 138, 139.

Habits of mind forgotten in religion, 224—237.

Heavenly-mindedness, best promoted by being much conversant with peculiar doctrines of Christianity, 340, 341.

Holy Spirit, Scripture doctrine concerning, 133, 171, 172.

— popular notions concerning, 139, 140.

Honour, false notions respecting it, 252.

Horne, Dr. quoted, 151.

Humility, best enforced by peculiar doctrines of Christianity, 334.

Humility the ground of Christian graces, 237.

— excellent practical effects of, 267.

Ignorance of Christianity, common, 95, 96.

— criminal, 96, 97.

Importance of Christianity, inadequate conceptions generally entertained of it, 91—104.

— of Christianity, proofs of the inadequate ideas generally entertained of it, 91—95.

— of Christianity, ideas of it given by the Holy Scriptures, 98—100.

— of Christianity, best enforced by peculiar doctrines of Christianity, 328, 329.

Inconsistency of the world's practical system, 344—346.

Indifference about Christianity, generally prevalent, 100.

— proofs of, general towards our Saviour, 136, 137.

Infidelity, common progress of it, 428, 433.

— a disease of the heart more than that of the understanding, 431.

Innocent young women, term how misapplied, 333.

— young women, the title disproved, 405.

Intellectual attainments, rated below moral, by Christianity, 347—350.

— low degree of excellence within our reach, 348.

Jones, Sir William, a champion for Christianity, 437.

Kenyon, Lord Chief Justice, commendations of, 391.

Language, common, concerning the importance of Christianity, 95.

— concerning human corruption, 104—107.

— common, concerning affections towards our Saviour, and Holy Spirit's operations, 139—141.

— concerning terms of acceptance with God, 173—177.

— concerning mode of relaxing the strictness of Christian precept, 222—224.

— concerning human judicatures, 222.

— concerning amiable tempers and useful lives, 269.

— common to people desirous of repenting, 202.

Learning, votaries of, 216.

- Life*, Christian, illustrated under figure of a traveler, 308.
- Christian's, a life of faith, 226—230.
- Liturgy*, bad effects to be feared from its disuse, 306, 387.
- Lives*, several mentioned, 426.
- Love*, true signs of it, 136, 137.
- of God, its essential characters, 198, 199.
- of Christ, justly to be expected of us, 159, 160, 167, 168.
- means of exciting it, 164, 165.
- of God, defective in nominal Christians, 310, 311.
- of God, proofs of its being defective, 312—315.
- of fellow-creatures, nominal Christians defective in, 315, 316.
- of fellow-creatures, true marks of, 316—320.
- of God, best enforced by Christianity's peculiarities, 332.
- Christians to cultivate this grace above all others, 413, 414.
- its excellent effects in the true Christian, 414.
- of fellow-creatures best enforced by peculiar doctrines, 334.
- Low* standard of practice generally prevailing, 191, 192, 208 225.
- Lower* classes, not unfit that true doctrine of acceptance should be stated to them, 183.
- McLaurin*, his Essays and Sermons referred to, 173, 187, 188.
- Maurice*, Mr. a defender of Christianity, 438.
- Maxims*, which prove human corruption, 112.
- Medium*, religious, almost lost, 220.
- Milton*, quoted, 132.
- Moral* attainments rated above intellectual, by Christianity, 347.
- attainments, how much more we can excel in them than in intellectual ones, 348.
- Moravians*, commendation of, 146.
- Natural* condition of man without Christianity, 118—123.
- Nature*, essential, of true Practical Christianity, 220.
- Necessity*, excuse on the plea of, stated and answered, 126—132.
- opponent on the ground of, how best opposed, 127, 128.
- Nominal* and real Christian, distinction between them most important, 395.
- Novels*, prove how peculiarities of Christianity have fallen into neglect, 367—368.

Objections against the religious affections towards Christ, and against the operations of the Holy Spirit, 141, 142.
 — against human accountableness discussed, 126—132.
 — against the religious affections towards Christ, and against the operations of the Holy Spirit, discussed, 143—171.
Outgrowing vices mistaken for forsaking them, 399—410.
Owen, Dr. referred to, 357, 365.

Palcy, Dr. his defence of Christianity noticed, 371.
Partiality in the religious views of nominal Christians, 209—211.
Particular, Christians must not fear to be so when required by duty, 255, 256.
Pascal's Thoughts referred to, note, 336.
 — Thoughts recommended, 439.
Peculiar doctrines, use of, in promoting humility, 334, 335.
 — in promoting moderation in earthly pursuits, 336, 337.
 — in promoting cheerfulness in suffering, 337, 338.
 — in promoting confidence in danger, and patience in suffering, 338—340.
 — in promoting heavenly-mindedness, 340, 341.
 — doctrines, demand our utmost attention, 184—187.
 — doctrines, use of, 330.
 — doctrines, use of, in enforcing importance of Christianity, 330—332.
 — doctrines, use of, in enforcing entire surrender to God, 331.
 — doctrines, use of, in enforcing guilt of sin, and dread of punishment, 331, 332.
 — in promoting love of God, 332, 333.
 — in promoting love of fellow-creatures, 333.
Philosophy, epicurism, and stoicism, 149.
Pleasure the true Christian finds in religion, 229—231.
Pleasures of true religion, 416—423.
Policy, mistaken, of compromise with immorality, 390, 391.
Polished state of society no security against progress of immorality, 388, 389.
Political good effects from the prevalence of Christianity, as above described, 373—386.
 — good effects from revival of vital Christianity, 386, 387.
 — bad effects from its further decline, 386, 387.
 — happiness of a Christian nation, 373, 374.

- Pomp* and parade, votaries of, 214.
- Poor* more favourably circumstanced as to religion, 183, 381.
- Pope*, the poet, referred to, 380.
- Popular* notions concerning our Saviour and the Holy Spirit, 135—137.
- Practical* hints on importance of Christianity, 103, 104.
- on human corruption, 126.
 - on mode of dealing with a certain description of infidels, 127, 128.
 - on the means of exciting our affections towards our Saviour, 187—190.
 - hints respecting love of estimation, 264—269.
 - respecting amiable tempers and useful lives, 282—284.
 - to naturally sweet-tempered, 283.
 - to naturally rough and austere, 284—287.
 - to true Christian, when engaged in hurry of worldly affairs, 289—295.
 - to persons desirous of repenting, 324—326.
 - respecting uses of peculiar doctrines of Christianity, 329—342.
 - for revival of religion, 389—391.
 - to various descriptions, 395—411.
 - to such as, having been hitherto careless, wish to become true Christians, 408—422.
 - to some who profess their full assent to fundamental doctrines of Christianity, 422—427.
 - to Sleepies and Unitarians, 427—436.
 - to half-unbelievers, 436—438.
 - to true Christians, from state of times, 439—444.
 - Christianity, chapter on, 190—342.
 - Christianity, prevailing low views of it, 190—195.
 - Christianity, its real strictness, 195—196.
 - its true nature, 196—200.
 - charged on all, without exception, in its full strictness, 201—205.
 - mischiefs of neglect of peculiarities of Christianity, 322.
 - distinction, fundamental, between systems of nominal and real Christians, 322—325.
 - precepts of Christianity most excellent, 253.
 - use of peculiar doctrines of Christianity, 328, 329.
- Prevailing* low views of practical Christianity, proofs of them, 192.

Prevailing inadequate sense of peculiar doctrines of Christians, 322.
Probation, notion of, disproves prevailing system of religion, 336 — 338.

Proof of Christianity's divine origin, 350—352.

Puritans, many of their writings recommended, 365.

Religion, practical hints for its revival, 389—394.

— the only true support in trouble and peril, 422.

Repentance, advice for such as are disposed to, 408—414.

Reputation, true Christian's conduct respecting it, 254—269.

— true Christian preserves, without overvaluing it, 255—260.

Richardson mentioned, 368.

Robertson, Dr. censured, 368.

Rousseau, school of, 296.

Scepticism, natural history of, 428—431.

Sceptics and Unitarians, advantages they have in attacking Christianity, 433—435.

Scripture doctrine, importance of, to Christianity, 98—100.

— doctrine concerning human corruption, 104—118.

— doctrine concerning Christ and the Holy Spirit, 133, 134.

Self-deception, frequent sources of, 395—408.

— another common kind, 422—426.

Self-examination, helps in, 395—397.

Selfishness of common practical religion, 210—216.

— the disease of political societies, 280.

— peculiarly counteracted by Christianity, 282—284.

Sensibility, exquisite, how little truly valuable, and how different from true practical benevolence, 295, 296.

Sensualists, class of, 212, 213.

Sin, how spoken of in Scripture, 301.

— defective conceptions of, 297—299.

Sincerity, false notion of, 101—103.

— true, what, 103, 104.

Sins, no little ones, 300.

— little, what accounted such, 299.

Smith, Dr. Adam, 165, 279, 280, 369.

Soame Jenyns, his View of the internal Evidence of Christianity referred to, 96, 372.

Sophistry with which religion is explained away, 222.

Stage, the, proof from its being frequented by nominal Christians of their defective love of God, 312—314, 320—322.

— proof from, illustrated by political analogy, 314.

Statutes, religion made a set of, 222, 223.

Sterne strongly censured, 296, 297.

Strictness of true practical Christianity, 194, 195.

— of our system objected to, as not suited to the state of the world, 370, &c.

— the charge refuted, 370.

Sunday, hints for its employment, 231—232.

— common modes of unhallowing it, 233, 234.

Supreme regard to be set on God, 119, 202—220.

Swift's Tale of a Tub quoted, 223.

Taste, votaries of, 216.

Temper, Christian, not cultivated, 226—237.

— respecting human estimation, 254—260.

— respecting calumny and disgrace, 260, 261.

— when too much immersed in worldly business, 292—295.

Theatres, Parisian, 313.

Theatrical entertainments prove defective love of God, 312—315.

— prove defective love of our neighbour, 313.

— illustrated by political analogy, 314.

Unbelievers, half, a class of them, 436.

Uncharitableness, what falsely so called, 401, 402.

Unitarianism often results from same causes as absolute scepticism, 433.

Useful lives, discussion concerning, 269—271.

— substituted for religion, 270.

— value of, estimated by standard of mere reason, 275—277.

— real worth of, on Christian principles, 277, 278.

— life, the Christian's life the most so, 282, 283.

— Christians urged to, 282.

— life, its just praise given to, 287, 288.

— apt to mislead us, 289, 290.

Vice, some one always excused, 339, 400.

Vices, outgrowing or changing them mistaken for forsaking all sins, 399.

Vulgarity in religion, as to language, to be expected from vulgar men, 145, 146.

Wealth, votaries of, 214, 215.

Women more disposed than men to religion, and uses to be made of this, 403, 404.

— exalted office assigned to them, 404.

Witherspoon, note, 365.

Youth, simplicity of, mistaken for religion, 402, 403.

Princeton Theological Seminary-Speer Library

1 1012 01001 4621

